Testimonies given at mass meeting held on Thursday, May 24, 1956

HUBBARD: We must hold on and hold out. We're at the Red Sea & Pharoah is behind us. . . . Following the_____ God's going to open the Red Sea for us.

YOUNG MAN: I was in this protest long before it began when I was all alone.

ELDERLY LADY: I'm dangerous to fool with. You boys lead on and I'll be right behind. Move right on. Move right on. The Lord is on his way to open up the_____and let the filth out.

ELDERLY LADY: (With dark horn-rimmed glasses. Mother & daddy slaves). My daddy said his feet froze on his feet. . . Yaw'l might get tired but if I hafta walk 50 years I ain't quittin. It takes grace, grits and greenbacks to run this.

MIDDLE-AGED LADY: I'm going to be sitting right beside Miss Ann. Mrs. Davis told her "When I get to heaven I hope you're my cook. God ain't gonna stand for no segregation. I just wish they'd let me get on television some time."

MIDDLE-AGED LADY: Josh went around the walls of Jerico 7 times before the walls came tumbling down. Don't expect this thing to be over the first time around.

: Jesus has walked with me every step I've taken in this protest.

: It burns my blood to see people of other nations who come in here & receive the ballot & other privileges while those of us who have histories greatest study on top toe could not give the answer as eloquently as you have given it here in simple words from your hearts.

KING: The question for us to answer is: "What is ultimate reality?"

1. Opening Hymn----"Lift Every Voice And Sing"----------Audience

Lift every voice and sing Till earth and heaven ring, Ring with the harmonies of Liberty; Let our rejoicing rise, High as the list'ning skies, Let it resound loud as the rolling sea; Sing a song full of the faith that the dark past has taught us, Sing a song full of the hope that the present has brought us; Facing the rising sun Of our new day begun Let us march on till victory is won.

God of our weary years, God of our silent tears, Thou who has brought us thus far on the way; Thou who hast by thy might, Led us into the light, Keep us forever in the path we pray, Lest our feet stray from the places, our God, where we met thee, Lest, our hearts drunk with the wine of the world, we forget thee; Shadowed beneath Thy hand, May we forever stand, True to our God, true to our Native Land.

The exclusion of Negroes from the administration of justice in the state courts of the South has long been the subject of serious criticism and concern. But little attention has been given to the extent of exclusion of Negroes from the federal courts of the South.

One obvious reason is that, in the conflict between state and federal law on basic Constitutional questions of the past two decades, the state courts have with frequency appeared as the antagonist of the Negro Southerner, and the federal courts frequently as his protector.

This protection has come, however, largely through the overriding decisions of federal appellate courts. As federal jurisdiction is extended, the role of the federal courts becomes ever more vital to the national effort to achieve full justice. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 enlarges the responsibility of the federal courts, including district courts, many of which in the past have been highly protective of segregation. The voting bill now before Congress seeks to by-pass these courts. New federal legislation to protect citizens against the Klan and other dispensers of death and ruin will, however, almost certainly increase the reliance on the district courts of the South for the protection of individual life and liberty.

Pressures to move civil rights issues out of the streets and into the courts continue. The question has to be asked (and it has always had its pertinency in criminal cases) -- what kinds of courts will handle them?

The federal court system in the South, guided by the Supreme Court and the Courts of Appeals, has slowly demonstrated the ability of a frankly white-dominated institution to deal justly with the broad, crucial questions of race. But now, not just the logic and principles of these very decisions, but all the practical understanding of human dealings that is implied in the term, "jury of his peers," requires a closer look at the racial composition of the courts themselves, as administrators of justice to the individual as well as guardians of principle.

This report deals with employment practices and jury composition of the southern federal courts. It is based on such documentation as there is available plus interviews with lawyers practicing in the federal courts of each state.

States covered by the survey are Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Texas in the Fifth Circuit; North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia in the Fourth; Tennessee in the Sixth, and Arkansas in the Eighth Circuit. Each state contains from two to four U.S. District Courts. Data on the Courts of Appeals refer only to their offices and operations within these eleven states.

Clerical records of the federal government do not designate race of court employees, and there are no compilations of statistics on racial composition of juries. No systematic examination of each court in each state was attempted. Respondents for the most part relied on memory and general knowledge. Results of such a survey are not definitive or finally authoritative; there is room for minor errors and oversights. But such a survey does reveal general patterns, and it is with these that we are concerned. If more detailed and precise research is stimulated, that is good; but the immediate purpose is a new awareness of the need to improve the situation.

I. EMPLOYMENT

The broad patterns regarding the role of Negroes in the federal courts under study in this survey can be summed up in the following statistical table:

RACIAL DISTRIBUTION OF OFFICERS AND PERSONNEL IN SOUTHERN FEDERAL COURTS

| | TOTAL | WHITE | NEGRO |
|---|---|---|---|
| Circuit Court Judges | 12* | 12 | 0 |
| District Court Judges | 65 | 65 | 0 |
| Referees in Bankruptcy | 55 | 55 | 0 |
| U.S. Commissioners | 253 | 253 | 0 |
| U.S. Clerks | 28 | 28 | 0 |
| Deputy U. S. Clerks | 321 | 321 | 0 |
| U. S. Attorneys | 29 | 29 | 0 |
| Assistant U. S. Attorneys | 158 | 153 | 5 |
| Jury Commissioners | 109 | 109 | 0 |
| U. S. Marshals | 29 | 29 | 0 |
| Deputy U. S. Marshals | 165 | 156 | 9 |
| Secretarial and Clerical | 364 | ** | ** |

*This is the number of judges of southern residence now serving on the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Circuits. The numbers respectively are three, seven, one, and one.

Exact number of Negroes not ascertainable. The number, from observation, is quite small.

The above table may possibly overlook some Negroes in some positions. But it cannot be far from the exact numerical situation.

The circuit court and district court judges are appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate. So are the United States attorneys and marshals. The clerks of the respective courts are appointed by the judges. The judges also appoint U. S. commissioners, jury commissioners, and the referees in bankruptcy. The clerks select their own deputies and clerical assistants, subject to approval of the judges. Assistant U. S. attorneys are appointed by the Attorney General of the United States. The Attorney General authorizes marshals to appoint deputy marshals.

Exclusion of Negroes from the top positions in the system obviously has the practical effect of virtually eliminating them from lesser positions. The influence on appointments and hiring by southern office-holders through political party patronage channels can't be overlooked.

Of the nine Negro deputy marshals there are two in Alabama, one in Mississippi, two in North Carolina, one in South Carolina, two in Tennessee, one in Virginia. Of the five assistant United States attorneys, one is in North Carolina, one in Tennessee, two in Texas, one in Virginia. This is at best tokenism.

In no state are Negroes serving in the positions of importance and highest responsibility except in token numbers as deputy marshals and assistant U. S. attorneys, and in four states -- Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, and Louisiana -- in none of these positions at all.

In lesser positions, a Negro clerical worker was noted in Alabama, a bailiff in both Florida and Georgia, court criers in Virginia and South Carolina, and two secretaries in Texas. Again, some may have been overlooked, but not enough to change the general picture.

In nearly every state, employment of Negroes in custodial jobs was noted. Use of Negro employees designated as "criers" or "messengers" as valets, chauffeurs, and the like was reported. In Georgia, such an employee's duties were described as helping the judge with his robes, bringing his books, and driving for him.

A respondent in Alabama said: "If it were not for the lone Negro deputy marshal, the District Court in Birmingham would look like the County Courthouse." A respondent in Virginia, when asked if he were describing Negro employment in addition to a deputy marshal and two criers as "negligible," replied: "non-existent." Instances were cited in Tennessee, Texas, and Georgia of Negroes turning down appointments or jobs. Strenuous opposition was encountered to appointment of the three Negroes in responsible jobs in North Carolina. This came from various sources, including political ones.

II. JURY SERVICE

Negroes are called and do serve on petit and grand juries in the southern federal courts. Estimating and evaluating the degree to which they do is of course not an exact science. One respondent's "tokenism" might be another's "substantial numbers" or another's "fair amount."

But for the very most part, lawyers interviewed in each of the eleven states were not satisfied that Negroes are serving on juries to the extent that they should be.

In Alabama, a typical jury panel was described as five or six Negroes among 110; Negroes occasionally serve on grand juries. An Arkansas respondent said he and others estimated that out of double panels of 40 to 50 persons, three or four might be Negroes, and out of a single panel of 24, one or two might be Negroes. In most cases in Arkansas, lawyers consider Negroes as "ciphers" who will go along with the majority, but they are said to dismiss Negroes when opposing counsel has been active in civil rights. There is a general understanding in Arkansas, a respondent said, of the need to avoid the appearance of systematic exclusion. In Florida, one sees "as many Negroes as women" on jury panels; their service was termed "more than token," but less than reflective of Negro population. Negroes were said to be called "fairly" for jury duty in Louisiana, but more than average numbers are eliminated by challenge or excuse from serving on the jury. The same was said of South Carolina. Mississippi's situation was described as "token." So was Tennessee's, Georgia's, and North Carolina's, with recognition in the latter of some improving efforts. In Texas, the estimate ranged from "token" to "substantial numbers," with more of a conflict of opinion among respondents over whether enough Negroes serve than in other states. A Virginia respondent said that from five to seven Negroes might be on a panel of 30, from two to five on a grand jury. A respondent said the number serving on federal juries throughout the state is "not sufficient."

The respondents described two problems involved in getting satisfactory numbers of Negroes on federal juries. One is whether or not enough Negroes are called for jury service in the first place. The other is whether among those called, even if it is a "fair" number, enough Negroes get through the various processes of attrition to do what really counts-- actually serve on a jury.

One often cited reason for a smaller number of Negroes called for jury duty is the lack of knowledge of the Negro community on the part of the mostly white court personnel. (All southern jury commissioners are white.) Prospective jurors are generally selected by a procedure described by the Judicial Conference of the United States in The Jury System in the Federal Courts, September 1960. It involves getting persons of substance to recommend those who might be selected. Often, only white persons make these recommendations. Even the Negroes who make them might not be persons of knowledgeable acquaintanceship in the Negro community. They are often the Negroes who happen to come into contact with white persons.

A Tennessee respondent said officials go to persons such as the presidents of chambers of commerce for names for jury lists. Use of state jury lists was reported in parts of Georgia and Virginia. Use of voter registration lists -- which are notoriously low in the number of Negroes -- was reported in Mississippi.

Some respondents singled out individual district courts where genuinely conscientious efforts seem to be made, with varying degrees of success, to get representative numbers of Negroes on the jury lists. These included the Middle District of Florida, the Atlanta Division of the Northern District of Georgia, the Middle District of North Carolina.

The lawyers interviewed were inclined to attribute the high amount of attrition among prospective Negro jurors mostly to racial circumstances, partly to other causes.

Peremptory challenges by opposing attorneys account for some of the attrition, particularly where the case involves Negroes. Negroes, in the view of defense attorneys, value Negro life and welfare, it seems, more highly than whites. Another reason often cited is economic, and it applies to large numbers of whites as well. Hourly wage earners (unless they have a union contract or other agreement guaranteeing compensatory pay) and persons of low income generally are unable to give up the working time (and pay) that jury service entails. So they get excused if they can. Negroes in disproportionately large numbers, compared with whites, are hourly wage earners and low-income workers in the South. A respondent in Mississippi commented that most Negro hourly workers there could probably earn more serving on a federal jury.

The broad findings of the study show that a Negro involved in federal court action in the South could go from the beginning of the case to the end without seeing any black faces unless they are in the court audience, or he happens to notice the man sweeping the floor.

The problem of the personnel of the courts seems easily and obviously remediable. More Negro appointments and hiring are needed. There are reports of political and other opposition when conscientious efforts are made to accomplish this. There are also reports of instances where Negroes turned down appointments or jobs. Negro attorneys are in short supply in the South, but the survey does not indicate by any means that their number or that of other qualified persons has been fully called upon.

The courts seem out of line with the fair employment hiring practices of federal agencies, not to mention the spirit and philosophy of the civil rights statute

But the employment practices of the court system is not the only, or even the largest, issue. The responsibility for the appointment of federal judges and the U.S. attorneys is the President's. At its 1964 Annual Meeting (November 20-21) the Southern Regional Council adopted and conveyed to the President a resolution which said in part:

> It is our strong conviction that only men of the highest professional competence and the fullest devotion to the declared principles of the Constitution should be charged with the judicial responsibility of enforcing federal laws in the South. It is our further conviction that no appointment contrary to these qualifications, however strongly urged by state or Congressional spokesmen, can satisfy the new politics of the South. In a situation where plain talk is desirable, we would report as plainly as we can that the progressive leadership of the South, both Negro and white, would find the appointment or promotion of any judge of well-authenticated segregationist views to be a severe blow to regional, national, and democratic interests.

The problem of jury service is more complex. If the impressions of respondents in this survey are correct, then a great many more Negroes need to be called and to serve on southern federal juries. The widespread reports of non-use of low income and hourly income workers on southern juries raise questions beyond racial considerations. One may not only ask if it is possible under present circumstances to get a federal jury of peers for people who are not white, but also for persons who, regardless of race, are not middle-class.

Proposals have been made to select jury lists much as public opinion poll samples are chosen -- at random in such numbers from lists of all qualified persons so as to get a true cross-section of the community in terms of the various socio-economic factors, including race and income level. Some such fresh approach seems needed.

There is an urgency to this. The goal of non-discriminatory selection of juries is to assure that only the facts and evidence of the case will affect outcome of a trial. It would be just as much a tragedy if public clamor and legal maneuvering over exclusion of Negroes from juries were to become a factor in the outcome of a trial as when this results from discriminatory bias in the composition of a jury.

Reform of the basic institutions of American society is compelled by the logic of the civil rights movement. What began as an effort to correct the most glaring inequities of racial discrimination requires that the general structure of inequity be overhauled, looking toward the ideal of liberty and justice for all.

EVASION OF SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

A decade of promise seemed ready for fulfillment in September, 1965. The tortuous process of school desegregation, continually before the nation's courts since 1954, at last offered promise of new dimensions and hope. The dream, embodied in Title VI of the Civil Rights Act, prohibiting "the extention of federal financial assistance to any dual or segregated systems of schools based on race, color, or national origin," was of a new era in which administration forces would take the initiative and achieve racial integration in schools. Hopefully, a sizeable proportion of the close to 98% of the South's Negro children still trapped in segregated schools would gain admission to integrated classes.

Prior to the start of the 1965 school term, the Negro school desegregation effort had met dismal failure; case after case of court-ordered desegregation hardly had made a dent in the unyielding armor of the South's segregation front. The burden of initiating suits and provoking "voluntary" change had been almost exclusively on the individual Negro pupil and his parents. With little money but firm intent, individual Negroes and several private organizations, primarily the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), found their limited resources constantly pitted against the public treasury -- local, state, and sometimes federal.

The prospect of going into almost every school district and the mounting costs for court actions were factors frustrating the school integration campaign, despite the fact that the May, 1954, U. S. Supreme Court decree was a class action purported to apply to all persons similarly situated. The mere opinions of states' attorneys are enough to bring across-the-board compliance in areas other than civil rights -- something hundreds of court suits have failed to do.

Civil rights supporters viewed school segregation among problems so serious in 1963 that some 200,000 participated in a massive March on Washington, and Congress the following year determined that legislative remedy for school desegregation was needed. This became part of the precedent-shattering Civil Rights Act of 1964. Title VI of the act provides that "no person . . . shall on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving federal financial assistance." This means that the federal public education subsidy, amounting to almost 20% of the total education budget could be withheld from schools which refused to stop segregation and discrimination against Negroes. The U. S. Office of Education thus became legally obligated for the first time to address itself to the problems of school desegregation.

Big Job for Office of Education

The intent of the law was to correct hundreds of years of separate discriminatory schooling; it offered remedial action which court decisions had failed to bring. The Office of Education was charged with heavy responsibility. The mere detail of executing the responsibility within the specified time required great effort.

The task required accurate school population and attendance information against which the responsible agency might measure its success in gaining compliance with the law. The disturbing fact is that the federal government, with all its vast resources, had not ascertained the number of Negro children enrolled in formerly white schools by mid-October, 1965. Ironically, during September and October, at the very time the information was most needed, no private or government agency knew the rate of school desegregation.

The privately-sponsored Southern Education Reporting Service, which in prior years carried school desegregation figures in Southern School News, ceased publishing in July, 1965. The Office of Education collected a smattering of data in procedures resting on the voluntary contribution of information. Their efforts were thwarted largely by earlier requirements and/or permission for records on race not to be kept. At no time since 1954 has less factual information on school desegregation existed. Some state and local school officials who, when asked about desegregation, said they don't keep racial figures implied that racial data were available to local and state authorities, but not for public release.

Findings of Southern Regional Council

In trying to determine what did happen last September, the Southern Regional Council's research department enlisted the cooperation of the Office of Education, the Southern Education Reporting Service, the various state Councils on Human Relations, and others. We have supplemented this with newspaper reports, and field reports. Even with this cooperation and our determined effort, the information in spots is sketchy. But it appears to be the best data currently available.

Our compilations show that estimates released October 1 by the Office of Education overstate the rate of school desegregation. Figures of Office of Education statisticians, arrived at by use of a hurried sampling survey of 590 of the 3,300 districts in southern and border states, say that 216,600 Negroes -- 7.5% of the South's Negro pupils -- are attending classes with whites. Included in the Office of Education's total was an estimate of 15,300 in Alabama, giving that recalcitrant state ten times more than the number estimated in the Office's own "work sheet" and the number indicated by Southern Regional Council's research.

The Office of Education's estimate of desegregation in North Carolina claims 24,500 Negroes are in desegregated classes there. Southern Regional Council's research finds

8,000, only a third of what the federal agency reports. The SRC estimate may be low. There is every indication that the Office of Education figure is high. The SRC figure is based on the estimates of Southern Education Reporting Service, news clippings, and field reports of the North Carolina Council on Human Relations. When asked for state figures, a high North Carolina education official said, "Any estimates that anybody would make would be in error. We have erased the question of race from the horizon. Anything that the U. S. Office of Education says would be in error, and anything anybody in our office tells you would be in error."

The Southern Regional Council survey finds 151,409 Negroes attending desegregated public school classes in the 11 states of the Deep South -- 5.2% of the South's Negro school census. That is more than 60,000 less than the 216,600 reported by the Office of Education. The Council's finding of 717 Alabama Negro pupils in desegregated schools does not include nearly 200 Negroes who applied for transfer, under "freedom of choice" options but reportedly withdrew because of pressures and various other reasons. The Office of Education tables did not reflect a number of cases of withdrawals prior to the start of school, but this does not explain all the differences in the surveys. The four following tables show comparative state desegregation totals for 1964 and 1965.

SOURCE: Figures compiled by Southern Regional Council, Inc., from news clippings, field reports, and reports of cooperating agencies.

In the absence of accurate information on the progress of school desegregation during the first two months of the 1965-66 school year, news media resorted to educated guesses and reported the generally optimistic and exaggerated opinions of school authorities. Some estimates ran as high as 20% of the Negro school-aged population, far in excess of the true desegregation rate.

The picture appeared so rosy that the nation was lulled into a false sense of success. The truth is that nearly 95% of the South's Negro pupils still are trapped in segregated and unequal schools. The false impression is due largely to attempts by state and local school authorities, and perhaps some federal officials, to imply that school systems were desegregated beyond mere tokenism.

Even with the lack of information to measure integration progress precisely, it is clear that the move so far toward the full promise of integrated education has been a feeble step. This is despite the integrity and the sense of proper intent evident in the Office of Education.

No one has ever quite developed to the point of art the necessary techniques for parrying and thrusting with a recalcitrant state or local government bent upon thwarting the will of law. But in retrospect, it seems apparent that the Office of Education might have avoided some of the more obvious errors that others have made in the past in southern desegregation duels:

(1) As with other agencies in Washington, there was first the process of promising the ultimate and then going through the steady process of deterioration of that promise. This was unfortunate because when the Capital makes promises from high places, the lowest people in the land hear, believe and act. The reaction of disillusionment is serious and could become increasingly more serious.

(2) In many instances, frenzy in government offices seems to have been misinterpreted as satisfactory progress. Accomplishment too often was equated with the amount of energy spent. Facing such a tremendous job, which we are sure at times seemed impossible to the Office of Education staff, policy makers should have realized that new, realistic approaches were needed to get the job done.

(3) The letter and spirit of the Civil Rights Law encourage voluntary compliance if at all possible. But in the reality of the southern desegregation situation, experience has proven that skillful administration is necessary to make sure that the "volunteer" does what he claims he will do. The tendency of the Office of Education to assume otherwise -- to expect normal forthrightness and good faith in the "voluntary" compliance -- is perhaps its largest strategic error so far. The office seems not to have been fully aware of the peculiar dimensions of compliance that is "voluntary" only at the threat of the loss of a sizeable percentage of the annual budget. The most rigid checks are needed -- and have been from the beginning -- to be sure at every step of the administrative process that plans for "voluntary" action comply with all requirements of the law, and that the plans are carried out so as to meet all requirements of the law. Any other course in the South in this matter risks criticism as naive and encourages the kind of winking at the law that has been for too long a serious fault of southern society.

There would have been no need for Congress to enact legislation if there had been any validity to the highly desirable premise that most school systems would (or could) act in good faith. The experience of the federal courts revealed that the restrained decision requiring school desegregation with "all deliberate speed" failed, not because the decision lacked wisdom, but because there often was lack of good faith on the part of those against whom the edict was directed. By their words, precepts and examples, southern politicians and school officials, with few exceptions, made clear time and time again after the May 17, 1954, Supreme Court desegregation edict their intention to evade and delay.

In this kind of situation, the attitude that tokenism was an achievement and subject for civic self-congratulation grew up -- often in the best intentioned of white Southerners, including school officials.

If federal officials were naive to believe school integration in the South could be achieved without rigorous administrative checks and controls, the local school systems in the South were remarkably consistent. Evasion has continued under the Civil Rights Act, and the highly sophisticated art of misleading the federal government has continued. In order to have their grants from federal funds certified, a majority of school districts made false claims that the money would be spent on a non-discriminatory basis. Just as the claims in many instances are false, it is hard to assume other than that many of those signing the statements deliberately set out to fool those reviewing the desegregation plans.

The school systems of the South are not operating on a non-discriminatory basis. Few people expected them to be. What was expected among Negroes and in other quarters was that an honest beginning would be made to that end, with the burden of gaining compliance shifted from the shoulders of the individual Negro pupil and his parents.

For some months, it did seem as if the burden of proving compliance would rest squarely with local and state school officials. Generating this hope was the knowledge that in the area of equal employment opportunity, tangible progress was experienced only after those employers awarded government contracts were required to prove by their record that they, in fact, were complying with the federal policy for non-discriminatory hiring.

A few school superintendents acted early and in good faith toward reasonable compliance, only to have themselves placed in precarious positions by the success of neighboring districts which were permitted to undercut the vacillating guidelines of the Office of Education. When it became clear, for example, that "freedom of choice" plans would be acceptable, most school systems took this route.

Under plans based on "freedom of choice," the student and his parents theoretically could apply and expect admission to any school of their choice in the district, so long as some general requirements were met. In the event a school became overcrowded, exclusions then would be based on proximity to the school, with those living closest admitted first. Guidelines covering this explain that discrimination is practiced unless a school is desegregated, and that a system is not fully desegregated if (a) race or color is a factor in student assignment, or (b) teachers remain racially segregated, or (c) any activities or services, including transportation, remain segregated or discriminatory.

Contrary to the goals of the guidelines, choice of schools was not free for most Negroes. To many school officials, it seems to have meant a free choice to exclude Negro pupils for specious reasons, including "bad manners," "bad character," "poor record," etc.

Negroes Intimidated, Pressured

It is difficult to overstate how much hope and enthusiasm was generated among Negroes early in the year when they learned the school desegregation problem was shifting from the judicial to the administrative department of the federal government. Subsequent experience proved the amazing fact of how far down the line this enthusiasm reached into communities -- in small towns, and in rural and urban areas. Negro parents seemed for the first time to see the chance for their children to get equal education. But the start of school brought disillusionment, and it brought pressures and indignities no individuals should have to bear:

(1) Some school superintendents met with parents whose children applied for transfers from Negro to white schools and told them the Negro children probably would come home many days with black eyes from beatings the Negro parents should hold themselves responsible for.

(2) Some Negro children were threatened with demotion or loss of units.

(3) Negro teachers in some districts were threatened with dismissal if Negro children transferred.

(4) In some instances, the names and addresses of Negroes applying for transfers to white schools were published, thus inviting intimidation of Negro families.

(5) Some systems mailed out information on "freedom of choice" arrangements for white parents, encouraging them to claim all vacancies prior to the notifying of Negroes about the free-choice compliance plan.

(6) Special affidavits, conferences, and/or employment information were required of Negro parents whose children sought transfers to white schools in some districts.

(7) Cross-burnings, shooting into Negro homes, and other acts of intimidation were used to force withdrawal of Negro students from some systems. (Surely, the Civil Rights Act in some way must be applied to protect citizens from such as this.)

Tokenism Brings More Demonstrations

The sum of these experiences to concerned Negroes and private organizations working with them added up to more frustration and distrust of constituted legal authority on the federal as well as the local and state levels. The loss of confidence in the commitment and will of the federal government to force full compliance with the Civil Rights Act, and the acceptance of un-free "freedom of choice" compliance plans have led to a situation in which militant civil rights groups are beginning again to take to street demonstrations, as in Crawfordville, Georgia, seeking redress of grievances.

Obviously, decisions were made to accept token effort at compliance in some recalcitrant sections. Dual law and dual policies -- one for sections with few Negroes and another for sections with large numbers of Negroes -- should not be. In other words, the Office of Education would seem to have erred in accepting two-grades-a-year plans in some Mississippi districts. Excepting these districts from the desegregation guidelines issued by the federal agency only prolongs and makes more laborious the process. The only way to desegregate is to desegregate. And the proof of compliance with any desegregation order is in the ability of schools to show that Negroes are in classes with whites in reasonable proportion.

The best measure of this desegregation would be on a class-to-class basis in every school in the various systems. That also is the best way to avoid transfers of white children from one school to another in search of an institution that had evaded the law, as was the case in Taliaferro County, Georgia, where all of the white children were transferred to schools outside the county (see attached editorial, page 23).

For some reason, there appears to be the thinking in the federal government that it is not within federal power to take the initiative to achieve compliance and correction of racial separation in schools, despite the fact that both the 1954 Supreme Court decision and the 1964 Civil Rights Act provide for school desegregation.

Enforcing law requires initiative. Federal officials use administrative fiat to enforce law in many areas. Administration is effecting policy and should not be circum-scribed by bureaucratic caution so long as the administrative acts are within the scope of the spirit and letter of the law.

Greater Effort Needed

It would be foolhardy to blame any individual or agency for the sorry progress of desegregation. It is common knowledge that any Office of Education official is confronted with the working conditions of bureaucracy and that actions of the Office of Education might be torpedoed by others in state, federal, and local positions.

It is hardly the fault of the Office of Education, for example, that little or no budget was provided for administration of Title VI funds, or that the few staffers who could be hired had to be brought on the payroll too late to do the job adequately. (Perhaps the White House and Congress share some of the blame for this.) We know that the few dedicated Office of Education staffers were overworked and vulnerable to the evasive tactics of many southern school superintendents and school boards. Consequently, we are sympathetic with the Office of Education's plight, though critical of what was accomplished. We have the advantage of hindsight in examining the problems. With these experiences and insights, we suggest the following changes:

(1) The "freedom of choice" concept (as practiced) should not be accepted on face value as a method of achieving desegregation in the South. There cannot be freedom where parents and children are intimidated for exercising a choice.

(It is ironic that we are hearing much criticism of "freedom of choice" in the southern region at the very time northern minority groups are fighting for it to rid their section of de facto and de jure segregation. We do not choose in this report to assess the pros and cons of the principle of freedom of choice, or to try to untangle the semantic snarls that have developed in the phrase. It might be acceptable if properly administered. But as it is being applied in the South, it is an inadequate doctrine for even minimal compliance with the Civil Rights Act. Indeed, the choice has not been free for the Negro children to select schools they want to attend in the South.)

(2) Administrative fiat and decades of following laws and traditions now adjudged unconstitutional created the school segregation problem, and administrative fiat and pressures must be used to correct it. School superintendents, if placed in the position of demonstrating to the satisfaction of federal agencies that funds are being spent without regard to race, would be found encouraging Negroes to attend formerly white schools in many instances. A handful of superintendents already are doing this and are justifying their actions by using the federal mandate as an excuse.

(3) Where local officials refuse to comply, funds should be cut off in accordance with procedures outlined in the Civil Rights Act. Thought should be given to the question of assuming responsibility for the education of children where such fund cut-offs occur. Government sponsored conferences in the few states where this is possible might study the possibility of temporary state option or trusteeship if local sponsorship is abandoned. And the Justice Department should be alerted for the possible initiation of legal action.

(4) In the absence of sufficient federal examiners to police the performance of school desegregation on district levels, technical assistance grants should be made to teams of professionals who could be recruited and co-sponsored by colleges and universities, civil rights groups, and/or the government, to review and challenge performance in integrating school systems. Complaints from local organizations should get quick follow-up by the Office of Education, including progress reports to complainants.

(5) Surveys should be made in all districts to determine the proportion of Negro school children, and the reissuance of Office of Education guidelines should indicate that a sizeable proportion of Negro children in racially mixed classes on all grade levels is needed for local systems to show proper performance in desegregation.

(6) If the Office of Education is going to continue permitting phased desegregation plans (as four grades a year for a three-year period), it should not allow token desegregation in the four grades chosen to be integrated.

(7) Briefing and information sessions sponsored under technical assistance should be held for all teachers in all Deep South schools. At assemblies or by use of educational television, for example, some teachers might be taught how to pronounce the word, N-E-G-R-O, and how to lessen the isolation of individual Negro students in predominantly white classes until this undesirable situation itself can be corrected. And Negro teachers of white youngsters might be taught how to deal with them. This would be a minimal, emergency approach and should not preempt any other technical assistance programs.

(8) Some special scrutiny should be given school systems which are under court orders to desegregate. Some are finding court orders advantageous for slow desegregation progress. For example, Clarendon County, South Carolina, which has been dickering in the courts for 16 years, had only five Negroes attending school with whites in 1964. The Office of Education admits it does not know how many Negroes in Clarendon attend desegregated classes during the current 1965 school year.

As it was stated by the U. S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in Price v. Denison Independent School District on July 2, 1965: "By the 1964 Act and the action of HEW /the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare/, administration /of the law/ is largely where it ought to be -- in the hands of the executive and its agencies with the function of the judiciary confined to those rare cases presenting justifiable, not operational, questions."

The most important thing to be remembered as the executive branch continues with its responsibility for desegregating schools is included in the Office of Education's policy statement and guidelines:

"The responsibility to eliminate segregation rests with the school authorities and is not satisfied by rules and practices which shift the burden of removing discrimination to the class or classes of persons previously discriminated against."

The Issue At Crawfordville

Unlike Birmingham, St. Augustine, Selma and Hayneville, the civil rights issue at Crawfordville, Ga., has not touched the American conscience. It hasn't because the headline questions already have been settled and the American people know it. Die-hard segregation, even to the extent of abandoning public education, just won't be permitted in the United States.

But in Crawfordville, the subtler forms of enforcing white supremacy have come to the surface and they have yet to be countered.

It was no surprise when a federal court this week declared Taliaferro County's schools bankrupt and turned them over to Georgia Superintendent Claude Purcell with instructions to end segregation. The county's efforts to preserve segregation by closing its white schools and sending all white students to other counties was doomed from the start. If Crawfordville's leaders didn't know that, eastern Georgia must be more isolated from the nation than the state's generally moderate record on the race issue would indicate.

The unresolved question raised at Crawfordville is whether racists will be allowed to use economic reprisals in their last-ditch efforts to preserve the status quo.

TALIAFERRO COUNTY'S schools will be reopened, but will the Negro principal and five teachers fired from Negro schools since the demonstrations began be rehired?

Will the two Negro bus drivers, two school cooks and two custodians get their jobs back?

Will the 22 parents of children in the demonstrations be rehired after firings from their various jobs in Crawfordville?

Will the six families evicted from their homes be allowed to return?

Will the demonstrator victims of four sudden foreclosures be given another chance?

SNARLING DOGS, Klan sheriffs and children locked out of schools have helped America move rapidly along the road toward equal opportunities for all its citizens. The kinds of economic pressures employed in Crawfordville are much less dramatic, but paralyzingly effective.

The next step in the civil right struggle is to deny to those who still shout "Never!" the economic weapons long used against Negroes and tested anew at Crawfordville.

SOUTHERN JUSTICE: AN INDICTMENT

SOUTHERN JUSTICE: AN INDICTMENT

Published by the Southern Regional Council and the American Civil Liberties Union

October 18, 1965

If the public could ever plead ignorance to the double standard of justice in the South -- one brand of justice for the white man, another for the Negro -- that time is past. On television and on the front pages of newspapers, the stories have come.

An FBI informant testifies that he is in the same car with three Ku Klux Klansmen as they shoot to death Mrs. Viola Liuzzo, a Detroit housewife, on an Alabama highway. The jury does not convict the first defendant charged in the crime -- not even of manslaughter. While waiting for a new trial the Klansmen rush off to a Klan rally in North Carolina to sign autographs, openly confident that any new trial will end the same way.

A Hayneville, Alabama, community leader named Tom Coleman shoots down two civil rights workers at midday. Jonathan Daniels, a seminarian, dies at once and the Rev. Richard Morrisroe, a priest, is critically wounded. The trial, reportedly, turned into a circus, with Mr. Coleman not simply acquitted but almost proclaimed a hero.

The Liuzzo and Daniels cases were not isolated incidents, and Negroes can only reflect bitterly when white men -- Southerners and Northerners alike -- advise them, as they often do, to stop street demonstrations and take their grievances into the courts.

The Liuzzo case was not an isolated incident. From the sit-in demonstrations of 1960 through the spring of 1965, at least 26 Negroes and white civil rights workers died at the hands of racists in the South. Only one of the assailants was sentenced to prison, and he for 10 years. During the same period, "justice" was dispensed in double measure when white men were slain by Negroes. Two white segregationists died in the aftermath of racial demonstrations. Four Negroes went to prison, one of them for life.

The danger today is not that the public will fail to know about the double standard of justice, but that the public will think it limited only to civil rights cases, or will fail to act. If the problem were confined only to civil rights cases perhaps it could be solved with nothing more than a stern law making it a federal crime to kill a civil rights worker. The problem, however, goes far deeper.

From Birth to Death

In many areas of the South, dual justice is a standing abuse to all Negroes -- the maid, the undertaker, the field hand, the school teacher, the minister. It exists from birth to death and the knowledge of it comes so early that a man may think he received it in his genes. It exists in the day to day brushes with "the law": the policeman on his beat, at traffic court, in civil cases. It exists in the more awesome confrontations with judges and juries in rape and murder cases. To the extent that it exists, it provokes desperation among Negroes, shakes their faith in democracy, causes them to shun the policemen and the courts as enemies. More than any other factor it is responsible for what the white South views as increasing "radicalism" and "anarchy" in the civil rights movement.

Why is it Possible?

Why is it possible under the American judicial system for a white man to murder a Negro without fear of serious retribution? How widespread is dual justice and what is its impact?

The malignancy probably is far more prevalent than most white people, North and South, realize. Why that is so is one of the chief internal political problems of this country. There may be many reasons for the continued existence of dual justice, but these must surely be among them:

Dual justice survives because Presidents continue to treat federal judgeships as political rewards and pacifiers. It survives because the Justice Department fails to exercise the power that it has to correct abuses. It survives because the judicial network, federal, state, and municipal, is still one of the most segregated institutions in America. It survives through a built-in discrimination in the selection of juries, state and federal, and through the ill-concealed contempt of many courts and police officers for the rights of Negro citizens. It seems a fair estimate that it will continue to prosper, no matter how shrill the outrage in the distant pulpits and editorial towers, until the Negro gains adequate political power and until a sufficient number of white Southerners insist on equal rights for the minority.

Dual justice takes many forms, some merely disgusting and others so quietly terrifying that they balk the scrutiny of rational men.

Capital Cases

Consider the case of Thomas Wansley at Lynchburg, Virginia. In the winter of 1963, when he was 19 years old, he was accused of raping two women, one white and the other Japanese, and of stealing $1.36 from one of the victims.

The white woman was unable to identify Wansley -- a Negro -- as her assailant. Police, however, after a private talk with Wansley succeeded in getting a confession. The Japanese woman positively identified Wansley. The youth admitted to having sexual relations with the Japanese woman -- not once but on several occasions. All-white juries deliberated, and handed down two death sentences for rape and a 20-year prison term for the $1.36 robbery. (The Virginia Supreme Court subsequently voided the sentences on grounds of trial error, and Wansley will be retried.)

Wansley, who had only one life to give, must have reflected bitterly on the knowledge that three months before in the same court room, a white man had received only a five-year sentence for raping an 11-year-old Negro girl.

Was this an isolated incident? Statistics amassed by the U. S. Bureau of Prisons answer, "no." Despite the fact that more than half of all convicted rapists are white, 87 per cent of all the persons executed for rape between 1930 and 1963 were Negroes convicted and sentenced by southern courts.

The wrath of southern judges and juries also falls on Negroes who are convicted of night-time burglaries and robberies. Between 1930 and 1961, 34 people were executed for this capital offense. Twenty-nine of them were Negroes and all but one were put to death in a southern or border state.

At first glance, Bureau of Prisons statistics would indicate that the Negro charged with murder receives better than equal treatment at the bar of justice. Negroes account for more than half of the murder arrests throughout the nation, but between 1930 and 1962 accounted for slightly less than half (49 per cent) of the executions. More detailed, if somewhat old, studies show, however, that the statistics conceal a double standard as menacing as any imposed for rape or burglary. Southern white juries are reluctant to hand down a stiff penalty to a Negro who kills a Negro, but are quick to exact the maximum penalty when a Negro kills a white person. Because most Negro murders are within the race, the execution statistics are relatively low.

The nature of the problem is shown in a study published by H. Garfinkel in a 1949 issue of Social Forces. Garfinkel examined murder convictions over an 11-year period in 10 North Carolina counties. He discovered that 26.6 per cent of all Negroes accused of killing white men received the death penalty. Most of the others received long sentences. Negroes accused of killing other Negroes fared far better. Only four per cent were executed; only five per cent received terms of 30 years or longer. Whites accused of killing Negroes had relatively little to fear at the hands of the court. None received life or death sentences.

Cash Register Justice

Negroes accused of minor crimes also have reason to fear their day in court. On the surface, the Negro would appear to receive equal justice in the traffic courts of many cities. A white man and a Negro stand before the traffic judge. Both are first offenders and both are found guilty of driving under the influence of intoxicating beverages. The judge pronounces a standard prescription for the malady: twelve months or $150. It appeared equal, but was it? The Negro earns $1.25 an hour when he can find work. He cannot raise the equivalent of three weeks salary. He goes to jail for a year. The white man earns $250 a week as a certified public accountant, hands over three days pay eagerly, and walks from court praising a benevolent judge. When the prescription isn't standard, the defendant who has his charge reduced so as not to lose his driver's license is more likely to be white than Negro.

"Cash register justice" is widespread in the South. The poor of both races suffer from it, but the Negro, being the poorest, suffers most frequently. In a 12 months period ending in June of 1962, 2,341 persons served terms in Georgia's state prison system for their inability to pay small fines. Seventy per cent of these were Negro.

A Georgia judge sentenced a 35-year-old Negro to "a fine of $25 or four months imprisonment" for driving without a driver's license. The court had no provision for installment plan fines. The Negro was unable to raise $25 "on the spot." He went to prison for four months.

Another judge sentenced a Negro woman to "$35 or 12 months in prison" for public drunkeness. She entered prison on July 12, 1963, and with time off for good behavior, emerged a "free" woman on May 24, 1964.

An 18-year old Negro youth was sentenced to "$85 or 12 months" for petty larceny. The same poverty that encouraged him to steal also forced him to serve the term.

"Cash register justice" is by no means limited to the backwoods counties in the South. The practice flourishes in a city like Atlanta. In 1961 and 1962, 40 per cent of all the misdemeanants in Georgia prisons were sent there by Atlanta-based courts. In an attempt to curb the practice, the Georgia parole board recently sought and won legislation making it more difficult for cities and counties to send the indigent to the state prisons. However, many courts in Georgia and in other southern states continue the practice of alternative sentences (a cash fine or a jail sentence) and when the state refuses to take the indigent prisoners, the courts jail them in city or county jails.

Experts in the field of criminal correction have cried out for years against the widespread use of alternative sentences, but much of the South hasn't listened. "The festering malignancy which eats at the administration of justice in misdemeanor courts is in evidence every day in those courts when fines are imposed," said a panel of experts in the book, The Law of Criminal Correction. "In many of them no effort is made to ascertain whether the offender is able to pay." The panel adds: "A modest fine with an alternative prison term imposed upon a man who has not the ability to pay is in fact a sentence to prison, while a substantial fine imposed on one of ample financial resources is inconsequential punishment." Just as uneven is the setting of bail, the same amount assuring the well-off the right to freedom before trial, sending the impoverished to jail.

Finding A Lawyer

As serious as they sometimes become, fines and bail are only small parts of the problem faced by the indigent Negro before the bar of justice. The problem of finding and hiring an attorney can be an acute one for Negroes. Often the Negro accused of a major crime is forced to accept a court-appointed white attorney with little enthusiasm for his case.

Take, for example, the case of Preston Cobb, Jr., a penniless 15-year-old Negro who lived with his mother on a farm near Monticello, Georgia. In June of 1961, Cobb was charged with slaying his white landlord, Coleman Dumas, Sr., as the man sat reading in his home. After interrogation, Cobb confessed to the slaying. "An all white jury found the youth guilty," wrote Claude Sitton of the New York Times. "His court-appointed attorney had made no request for mercy and none was recommended by the jurors. The jury had no choice but to send Cobb to the electric chair." Once alerted to the case, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People retained an Atlanta attorney, Donald L. Hollowell, to appeal Cobb's case. In the appeal Mr. Hollowell charged that the white attorney neglected to bring up the question of Negro exclusion from juries in the county. "He would have felt it not to be in his best interest as a white lawyer practicing in and around Jasper County to have raised said issue," Hollowell said.

Even when they have the money, Negroes may find it difficult to find an attorney to represent them. In the Deep South, Negro attorneys are sometimes reluctant to accept controversial cases. They can cost an attorney his law practice and result even in ostracism by his community.

In the spring of 1965, Warren C. Fortson, an established attorney in Americus, Georgia, and brother of Georgia Secretary of State Ben Fortson, agreed to defend two Negro teenagers identified with civil rights against charges of fornication and touched off a storm of protest that, along with milder resentment of his role in calling for a biracial committee, ultimately forced him to leave the city. In the trial, one patrolman testified in detail to lurid acts which he said he witnessed. Under cross examination, another law enforcement officer conceded he was standing beside the patrolman and saw nothing more than heavy petting. The two teenagers were convicted by the court and sentenced to reform school. Fortson, for his role in the case, was convicted by the public and forced to leave the city. He deemed his future effectiveness as an attorney destroyed. "How could I pick 12 men for the jury box so at least one wouldn't gut me just because I'm me?" Fortson asked. "We have made great progress in desegregation and race relations but the courthouse crowd has done everything they could to harass. The oppression of the courts and law enforcement are Negroes' major grievances now."

Warren Fortson's story, of course, is not unique. In 1963, Charles Morgan, who had already aroused hostility in Birmingham for his willingness to represent Negroes in controversial cases, lost his law practice for urging Birmingham to re-examine itself in the wake of a church bombing in which four Negro children were killed. He left Birmingham to become a staff counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union and is now waging a legal fight to integrate white juries, proportionate to population.

Two years after Morgan left Birmingham, another attorney, Paul Johnston,agreed to defend a government undercover agent against a Ku Klux Klan attorney. His decision, which he made at the urging of U. S. Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach, cost him his membership in one of Birmingham's most prosperous law firms, a firm which still includes his father and a brother. Daniel H. Pollitt, a professor of law at the University of North Carolina, had earlier observed: "The small band of southern attorneys who undertake 'racial' litigation often find the common courtesies of the bench and bar denied them."

White Supremacy on the Bench

With or without adequate counsel, the Negro must often face a hostile judge. Many southern judges are, of course, scrupulously fair. Others seem to view themselves less as impartial umpires and dispensers of justice than as defenders of white supremacy.

In one large southern city in 1962, a 25-year old Negro was summoned from his jail cell to a municipal courtroom. The judge had received complaints that the defendant, while serving on a prison work gang, had failed to say, "yes, sir" to a foreman with the Birmingham Park and Recreation Board and had "scuffled" with an assistant jail warden. The Negro man contended that the assistant warden had attacked him as part of a lesson in "politeness." He asked permission to go to a hospital for treatment for sore ribs. "No," said the judge as he ordered him to pay a $55 fine. "Until you learn to say 'yes, sir' to white people you can stay in jail."

The view of Negroes as second class citizens sometimes extends to the federal bench. In Jackson, Mississippi, federal Judge Harold Cox once referred to Negroes as "chimpanzees," criticizing their voter registration activities.

Judges are often inclined to be lenient with whites who are charged with offenses against Negroes and harsh with Negroes accused of crimes against whites. In New Bern, North Carolina, in June of 1965, three white men -- one of them an exalted Cyclops in the Ku Klux Klan -- admitted bombing a Negro funeral home and two cars which were parked outside a Negro church. They have yet to serve a day in prison. A superior court judge handed down suspended sentences. In Georgia, a 75-year-old white woman, jay walking after being warned repeatedly by police, walked into the side of a car driven by a Negro and was killed. Officials were reluctant to file charges against the Negro, but ultimately did so after pressure from the woman's family. Rather than face an all-white jury, the Negro elected to appear directly before the judge. He lost his gamble. The judge sentenced him to five years in prison. A police official called the sentence a "raw deal" and termed the woman's death "strictly" accidental, but the words didn't help the Negro.

The Jury Problem

Despite the outrageous outcome of his case, the Negro may have been wise to prefer a judge rather than a jury. Southern juries tend to be all-white and, all too often, inclined to support other whites in legal clashes with Negroes.

"Take for example, the killing of Clinton Melton, in Glendora, Mississippi, in the Delta, by a white man named Elmer Kimbell, a close friend of the man who had been acquitted of the murder of Emmett Till," Robert Penn Warren wrote in his book, Segregation. "When the Lions Club met three days after the event, a resolution was drawn and signed by all members present: 'We consider the taking of the life of Clinton Melton an outrage against him, against all of the people of Glendora, against the people of Mississippi, as well as against the human family . . .' And the town began to raise a fund to realize the ambition of the dead man, to send his children to college. . ." "But," Warren added, "in that division between man and man, the jury that tried Elmer Kimbell acquitted him."

The record of southern juries in racial cases is so depressingly anti-Negro that some observers have come to question the fairness of the jury system itself. Such sweeping criticism of one of man's sanest achievements -- the right of trial by jury -- is indicative of the danger of allowing the jury system to operate in crippled fashion. It is not merely a matter in the South of a rare, occasional miscarriage of justice growing out of the nature of the jury system at its best. "This is the price we have to pay for the jury system," Attorney General Katzenbach was quoted as saying after the Coleman acquittal in Hayneville, though not talking directly about that trial. The price is being paid for the crippled condition of the jury system. For there is no doubt that the jury system as it now operates in most parts of the South -- and, it should be said, in many parts of the United States -- is grossly unfair. It is unfair not only to Negroes but to poor whites, as well.

Much of the problem is in the selection of jurors. In almost no courts are jurors picked by thoroughly objective means to ensure a true cross-section of the community.

Charles Morgan, in a suit attacking the jury system of Jefferson County (Birmingham), Alabama, makes the point that most courts in the country use selection methods that work against obtaining a cross-section.

Mr. Morgan said in his brief, "Selection techniques now differ from state to state and within states from court to court. The federal system differs from the state system. Qualifications differ from state to state. Federal qualifications differ from state qualifications.

Indeed, former Assistant Attorney General Burke Marshall recently noted: 'A justice department survey in 1961 showed that the 92 federal district courts had 92 different systems of selecting juries.'

"One jury commissioner's telephone book is another's city directory. A third may try voter registration lists. The Junior Chamber of Commerce; church membership lists (regardless of the First Amendment); lists of school teachers; American Legion posts or labor unions; lists of industrialists and lists of automobile owners; lists of householders or PTA members, or registered voters or real property tax payers -- all are used."

Mr. Morgan pointed out that many of the federal courts rely on the "key man" system. Persons well known to the court -- usually men of substance -- are tapped and they in turn suggest their friends.

Mr. Morgan said, "One clear light shines through the forest of lists -- the United States in almost every one of its courts tries its citizens before Literary Digest juries."

That was an allusion to the old Literary Digest method of polling national issues and elections. The magazine went out of business after a spectacular polling failure in 1936 when it predicted that Landon would defeat Roosevelt. Subsequent evaluation of the Digest techniques indicated the reason for the failure: The magazine based its predictions on the opinions of middle and upper class Americans and paid no attention to the poor. Mr. Morgan concluded that present-day juries are selected by the same discredited method, ignoring the welfare and relief rolls and all other lists that would give the poor a voice on juries.

Governor Robert McNair of South Carolina was quoted recently as saying that the real threat of increased Negro votes is not so much at the polls as on juries. He said that adding large numbers of Negroes to the electorate would put more and more illiterates on juries, and he saw that as unfortunate.

If it is proper for a middle class public official charged with embezzlement to be tried by a jury of his peers -- other members of the middle class -- why is it improper for a penniless Negro to have his fate decided by a jury that includes his peers?

Instrument of Oppression

In the system of justice portrayed by Franz Kafka, an innocent man could be accused of an unspecified crime by a faceless court. The court was corrupted almost absolutely, so that by manipulation and tribute the accused could avoid prison. But the freedom he enjoyed was perhaps worse than imprisonment. He could never win definite acquittal of his unstated charge; he could only choose between ostensible acquittal and indefinite postponement. Under the first, the accused and his representatives might cajole and manipulate a sufficient number of judges to have the case informally set aside and forgotten. The drawback was that a new judge in another part of the hierachy might rediscover the charge sometime in the future and order the accused arrested again, thus starting the process over. If the accused selected indefinite postponement, his case could never be disposed of decisively but, through the same use of influence, it could be kept always in its early stages, never moving toward trial and sentencing as long as the accused unflaggingly minded his attentions to the judges and their functionaries.

It can be said without unconscionable exaggeration that the southern system of justice suspends the Negro in just such a state of torment and obligation. Because he is black he is continually subject to caprice. In a manner of speaking, there is no such thing as "definite acquittal" for the Negro. His color carries with it a presumption of hard luck in the white man's courts; a given Negro is automatically a poorer risk than a white man at the bar of justice. That is a statistical certainty that hovers over every Negro and makes him never quite free.

But, like Kafka's accused innocent, the Negro is not without a fretful, worrisome kind of hope. He is reminded constantly that he can buy insurance against the harshness of the system. One thing that most Negroes learn early is that a "good nigger" fares better in times of trouble than a "no 'count nigger." By debasing himself systematically, a Negro can earn a reputation as a "good nigger" and assure himself of favored treatment should he be called to account in a court of law.

It is common knowledge that many a southern jury, in deciding the fate of a Negro charged with a crime against another Negro, tempers its verdict if the accused has a white man to vouch for him or if he stands well in the white community. If a Negro has been scrupulous in cultivating the good will of white men of standing, he is safer from the caprices of the system. The unfounded criminal charge is more likely to be dropped and the justified charge is less likely to result in a heavy penalty.

A Negro who neglects his reputation is always at the threshold of trouble with the law. If a crime is committed, all the "bad niggers" are rounded up routinely. A Negro man who takes the liberty of speaking assertively to a policeman is much more likely to go to jail on a trumped-up charge than a white man who speaks the same way. Even when an honest mistake is made in charging a man with a crime, the accused Negro who has no white patron has greater difficulty in extricating himself from the white man's jail.

All-White Justice

Once the Negro is under arrest, he enters a world that is almost totally white, and every person he encounters could mean trouble.

Attorney Morgan, defending a Negro charged with murder in 1963, filed a motion to quash the indictment in which he outlined his client's prospects. He wrote of the man's being arrested by white policemen, carried off in a segregated paddy wagon driven by a white man and locked up in a segregated jail staffed solely by whites. He was to be brought to trial in a courthouse inhabited by whites, in a segregated courtroom run by white officials, before a jury that almost certainly would be solidly white.

"If he receives the death penalty," Mr. Morgan wrote, "he will then be given a last meal by his white guards, visited by a white chaplain, shaved by a white barber, and taken by white guards to a yellow electric chair in Kilby Prison . . . the chair being the only facility in Alabama justice which is and has always been desegregated. . ."

"A button or switch will be pressed or pulled by a white man, before white witnesses, and the condemned will die. Being in indigent circumstances, he will thereafter be buried in a potter's grave in a racially segregated cemetery, provided by the state of Alabama."

It might be protested that Mr. Morgan has been unduly harsh, but note the findings of the United States Civil Rights Commission in a recent survey: 87 per cent of county jails and 93 per cent of state penitentiaries in the southern and border states are segregated; 63 per cent of the courthouses have segregated rest rooms; 17 per cent have segregated court rooms.

Jack Nelson, writing on Jim Crow justice in the Los Angeles Times, concluded, "In some areas of the South the system is so loaded against the Negro that his only choice may be to throw himself on the mercy of the courts."

Classic Corruption

What the South is faced with is a monstrous corruption, no different in any essential way from other classic cases of political corruption. The system has been tampered with to give one group a social, political, and economic advantage at the expense of another group.

The nation, for some reason, has not yet learned to deal with the corruption of justice by racism. In other, more pedestrian shortcomings, America has been able to call on its tradition of pragmatism and produce reform, and the reform always has been within the liberal democratic framework. Now, with the nation seemingly unable to abolish this particular corruption pragmatically, a new mode of reform is arising. It is a radical reform whose adherents are uncommitted to liberal democracy and the American tradition of pragmatism. These new reformers, who proudly wear the name of radical, move at the fringes of the civil rights movement, working frankly at the total destruction of the system that deals unjustly. Occasionally, one can hear a bitter young civil rights worker call openly for a riot, on the theory that only through violence can the white majority be persuaded to take its foot off the neck of the oppressed minority.

Democracy Damaged

Of all the forces that urge the Negro away from the American democracy, none is more vicious or more effective than the dual system of justice. His ingrained knowledge of the dual system causes a Negro instinctively to dodge a policeman. The same wretched awareness leads him to think of the courts as a white man's game, and, since to the Negro in poverty the court is one of the most visible arms of the government, it tempts him to consider the entire governing system as a device for maintaining the white man in charge and the Negro in "his place." From the Deep South, he carries his fear, resentment, and distrust to the ghetto slums of the rest of the nation, like the Watts area of Los Angeles where rioting was touched off when policemen made an arrest. Too often, he finds, out of the South, the familiar taints of dual justice.

The duality is so successfully pernicious that multitudes of Negroes have gone to their graves without doubting the rightness of the scheme.

Other Voices

But now the scheme is being doubted, and voices are being raised against it.

In June, the police at Jackson, Mississippi, arrested more than 800 Negroes for demonstrating in opposition to what they considered the "illegally constituted legislature" in Mississippi. They were herded into display halls at the Mississippi state fairgrounds. Convinced that the full force of the law was being directed against them, they assembled in a Negro church afterward to air their grievances. Willie Ricks, a SNCC field worker, took the podium and told the Negroes that they could expect no justice from "Mr. Charlie's courts." And, he said, the situation would be little better in federal courts. Hadn't President Johnson just appointed J. P. Coleman (a former governor of Mississippi who is considered a moderate by some, but a segregationist by Negroes familiar with many of his utterances and acts while governor) to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals?

As a result, Mr. Ricks said, the Negro would have to protect himself. "When the spirit say shoot," he said, "we're going to shoot. When the spirit say throw rocks and bottles, we're going to throw rock and bottles."

In Bogalusa, Louisiana, in July, the police stood by smiling while a barber turned a water hose on a civil rights worker. "I almost hit him," the civil rights worker said later. "A year ago I was nonviolent -- I really believed it as a philosophy -- and everyone I knew in the movement was nonviolent, but now it's nothing more than a tactic. Almost no one talks of nonviolence as a philosophy any more."

A Negro lieutenant was brutally beaten in Canton, Mississippi, and the police made no arrests. Soon after, civil rights workers brought a shotgun into the Freedom House at Canton for protection.

The white officials of several southern states have expressed alarm at the growth of the Deacons for Defense and Justice, a Negro protective league that advocates carrying arms and shooting back when white racists attack. The dismayed officials miss an important point. Of all the reasons for the popularity of the Deacons among Negroes -- and they are complex -- the one that stands as an incontrovertible rebuke to the people who govern the South is the Negro's experience with the white man's justice. In too many places, the Negro cannot depend on the police for protection and, when an occasional terrorist is arrested and brought to trial, the Negro can be confident that the white court will turn the offender loose or punish him so lightly that the penalty is interpreted as quiet approval of terrorism.

Day-To-Day

The Negro's loss of confidence in the white man's system of justice does not have to be traced to the more drastic failings. A murderous bombing is terrifying in its impact, but perhaps just as damaging to the Negro's faith in his government is the unspectacular, continuous erosion produced by his day-to-day contact with the system. The demoralizing nature of this contact is summed up in a Negro's encounter with two southern policemen as recounted by Claude Sitton in the New York Times. The encounter, shy of brutality, might be called routine intimidation, the kind that every southern Negro dreads.

"The Negro watched anxiously as the two whites in uniform jumped out and approached him," Mr. Sitton wrote.

"'Where're you going, nigger?' demanded the driver.

"'Home,' replied the man.

"'Let me see your identification.'

"'He fished out a longshoreman's card and handed it to the policeman.

"'Take off your hat, nigger,' ordered the policeman, still looking at the card. Before the command could be carried out, he snatched the hat from the man's head and threw it to the pavement.

"'What's that in your pocket?'

"'Nothing.'

"The policeman thrust a lighted match into the lapel pocket of the man's coat. Striking a second match, he held it to the card, which curled and blackened in the yellow flame.

"'You go on now, nigger,' said the policeman. And he and his partner strode back to the police car and drove away."

The First Steps

There are no easy solutions to the Negro's problems anywhere and that is particularly true in the area of equal justice. But it is clear that several steps must be taken before any real progress can be expected.

To begin at the top, the President of the United States needs to find men for federal judgeships who do not owe their political careers to the same system that perpetuates dual justice. Some of the most notorious appointments to the bench have been made by liberal Democratic Presidents, simply because a President is loath to violate the tradition of letting these appointments be made, in fact if not in name, by the ruling Democratic apparatus in the one-party states of the South.

Not all judicial appointments have been unfortunate, and in fact, many have been thoroughly laudatory. But even the "good" judges have added to the Negro's woes. The 28 court clerks and the 109 jury commissioners attached to the federal courts of the 11 states of the Old Confederacy are solidly white -- all appointed by the 65 white district judges. Through these appointments, the judges build higher the walls of segregated justice.

Despairing of any immediate end to dual justice in the South, Negroes are turning increasingly to the U. S. Department of Justice, demanding that it "do something." Often the Negroes are disappointed. Although systematic exclusion of Negroes from juries is at the root of dual justice, not once during this century has the Justice Department prosecuted anyone for the practice. This, despite a specific law -- passed in 1875 -- which makes jury discrimination a crime punishable by a fine of up to $5,000.

Despite spectacular arrests in Mississippi and Georgia, the Justice Department has also been cautious at best in prosecuting racist terrorists under existing federal law, contending that in most cases it lacks jurisdiction. The Department's argument has been challenged by some of the nation's most eminent law professors. In the summer of 1964, for example, Robert Kennedy, who was then attorney general, told a civil rights delegation that terrorism in Mississippi was a "local matter for law enforcement" and said that his power to move against it was "very limited." Twenty-nine law professors, representing six leading law schools, quickly prepared a group statement arguing that Title 10,

Section 333 of the U. S. Code gives the President power to suppress "any domestic violence" through the use of "the militia or the armed forces, or both, or by any other means."

Probably the most frequent criticism of the Justice Department voiced by civil rights workers centers on FBI agents who, as during arrests for peaceful demonstrating, observe violations of constitutional rights, take copious notes on it, but rarely intervene. Arrests were made by federal authorities on complaint for interference with constitutional rights during the Mississippi Summer of 1964. Then, three men were charged with violation of Title 18, Section 241 of the U. S. Code, for interfering with voter registration workers in Itta Bena. The Justice Department filed a court suit seeking full protection of constitutional rights to peaceably assemble for demonstrations, this during a voter registration campaign in Greenwood, Miss., in 1963. But such actions are so rare as to be almost unheard of.

Out of criticism over this has come the cry for a special federal police force to handle racial matters with the same efficiency the federal government handles cheating on income taxes. Those who are wary of more federal police are forced back to the drastic need for basic reform of existing methods of law enforcement.

Often the federal government seems to say it is as helpless as the Negroes themselves at gaining compliance with federal statutes and the U. S. Constitution through the normal procedures and institutions of southern justice. What does this say to Negroes across all America, and to the world?

Public Responsibility

Nothing less than a public outcry against dual justice is needed, coupled with a specific program to eliminate some of the most flagrant abuses. One step of the program must be a jury system that will not include just "token juries" but a completely representative cross-section of an entire judicial district -- whites as well as Negroes. Attorney Morgan recommends the Kraft-Rosenbluth system of jury selection. By the use of racial, population density, sex, economic and other census data, John F. Kraft, a specialist in public opinion surveys, and Leon Rosenbluth, a consulting statistician, have devised a system for the random selection of juror's names. It would abolish all subjective standards of juror selection and would not require "the use of judgment by a jury commissioner or key man." It also would eliminate "Literary Digest" jury lists taken from phone books, voter registration lists, etc.

Discriminatory appointment and hiring of court officials and employes needs to be eliminated in not just the state but also the federal courts of the South. As on a jury, the mere physical presence of Negroes could accomplish much in eliminating gross expressions of racial bias.

Eliminating court and jury discrimination is only a step, however. The cases of Preston Cobb, Jr., and countless other Negroes illustrate the need for a workable public defender system, one in which the attorney would be hired on a career basis and thus be free of public pressure. Or perhaps other systems can be devised which will provide Negroes advocacy rather than echoes from the South's past. To eliminate cash register justice, the use of the installment plan method of paying fines should come into widespread use. And, indeed, a judge should determine the ability of a defendant to pay before he hands down a fine. To reduce the possibility of overly harsh sentences, some penologists have suggested that legislatures pass laws making it mandatory for the judge to receive a complete presentencing report from court investigators before handing down a sentence of more than two years. The report should include an assessment of the defendant's prospects of rehabilitation, his general character and reputation, his previous court record, his record as a parent, etc. This could have the effect of making the judge see the defendant as a person, rather than as another criminal standing before the bar of justice. It would also result in a delay in sentencing and give the judge a chance to reflect on the sentence before he hands it down. The same weighing of individual circumstances is needed in the setting of bail.

It is obvious on the face of it that dual justice could not exist, at least with its present excesses, if the American bar had taken aggressive action to end it. At best, attorneys in most areas of the South have been shy in accepting controversial cases involving Negroes, thus allowing the full wrath of segregationists to fall on a handful of Negro and "liberal" white attorneys. There is a desperate need for national and southern bar associations to begin enforcing their ethical codes in a manner which will guarantee that Negroes will be able to choose from a broad range of attorneys. Individual lawyers would be less reluctant, perhaps, to accept controversial cases if bar associations made it clear to the public that lawyers have the obligation to provide vigorous defense not only for white clients but for Negroes and unpopular white clients as well.

Finally, the people of the South must be fully aware that they have this sickness among them, and that it must be cured. White people sometimes complain that they are weary of being constantly reminded of the Negro revolution. Their weariness is nothing compared to the Negro's.

The ultimate responsibility is with the people to assure liberty and justice for all -- in the South and across the nation wherever dual justice prevails.

MEMORANDUM

January 14, 1966

TO: Participating agencies, Southern Interagency Conference

FROM: Edwin J. Stanfield, Director of Field Activities

This is to remind you once again of the meeting of the Southern Interagency Conference on January 26-27. We shall begin in the SRC conference room at 2:00 p.m. on the twenty-sixth, and the conference should end by mid-afternoon on the twenty-seventh.

Enclosed is a copy of the proposed agenda.

I hope that you will have a representative here.

PROPOSED GRANTS-IN-AID SCHEDULE, 1966

Condition of grants:

1. All grants to be paid quarterly on January 1, April 1, July 1, and October 1 of 1966 unless otherwise indicated.

2. Grants will not be paid until such time as adequate quarterly program and financial reports have been received by SRC.

3. Grants are contingent on professional staff being maintained by the recipient councils.

4. It is expected that local fund raising will be held at least at the rate of 1965. Should this not be the case, revision during the year will be necessary, unless there are special circumstances. In cases where fund raising falls below 1965 rates, staff will withhold funds pending determination by the Executive Committee.

5. All grants are to be reviewed and likely revised if the performance of the recipient council in all areas, including program and membership, is below realistic expectations. In such case, staff may withhold funds pending a review and decision by the Executive Committee.

TO: State Council Directors or Chairmen

FROM: ED Stanfield

The next meeting of the state council directors will be held on Wednesday, Febraary 2, 1966, in the SRC conference room, beginning at 10:00 a.m. We should finish around four o'clock.

SRC will pay travel costs and Atlanta expenses for the director and chairman of each council. Other staff members are welcome, but expenses will have to come from the state council budget.

Please make every effort to get your chairman here. The expanded grant-in-aid program will be the principal item on the agenda, and it is important that the chairmen understand the purposes, limitations, etc., for this program.

If you wish to confer with any of the SRC staff or need to visit the Atlanta offices of allied agencies, please feel free to come a day early or stay a day afterward.

RE: "Doctor Bill" Insurance under Medicare

At our meeting on January 26-27 Mr. Frank Sloan, Regional Director for the Office of Economic Opportunity, asked that all agencies publicize, through newsletters or in any other way possible, the fact that Medicare's $3 per month voluntary doctor insurance plan must be applied for by March 31. This is very cheap coverage, but it is not automatic.

O.E.O. has a "Medicare Alert" program aimed at spreading this word. They will provide payment of $1.25 per hour, plus transportation for persons to visit lists of eligible people provided by the Social Security Administration. If you are interested in this program, call O.E.O. at once but first call your Social Security office to find out (1) what has been done, (2) exactly what the rules are concerning election of this coverage, and (3) whether or not the local office will provide lists of eligible people.

In some instances, local welfare offices will assume the cost for those on their rolls who cannot afford even the $3 per month. You may wish to inquire about this.

Unfortunately, there is hardly time to secure O.E.O. funds and employ visitors; therefore, we are asked to help get the news out as best we can.

(According to Sylvia Porter, only a little over half of the 17 million eligible old folks have signed up so far.)

Dear Mr. Manser:

This is to confirm that I will attend the Regional Consultantion of the National Social Welfare Assembly in New Orleans on February 15. Mr. Paul Anthony, Director of S.R.C., had written to you about this in his letter of January 6, and I have received the packet of background materials.

Dear Jim:

Needless to say, we were all very disappointed that you found it necessary to decline the offer of the position of Executive Director of the Alabama Council on Human Relations.

I trust that nothing about the terms of the offer which might have been negotiable affected your decision to any considerable degree.

I still feel that you could make a valuable contribution in the building of the New South. If you ever decide to stop defying the will of the Lord, let us hear from you.

Best wishes,

RE: Miscellany

Don't forget to send me any suggestions you have to help us with our search for positive steps taken by mayors, city councils, city managers, police commissioners, or other municipal authorities in the South toward improved inter-group relations. This is for an "experience report" for the U.S. Conference of Mayors. It could pertain to almost any of our program concerns: housing, employment, education, police practices, city planning, urban renewal, the poverty program, etc If you have a Mayor or other official or group to suggest, please let me know right away -- and a brief two or three lines on what he or they did and the apparent result would be helpful. Remember that we are not interested only in large cities

My home telephone number is 351-2185. Feel free to call me any time.

---

Under separate cover we are sending you a number of copies of a "newsletter" from the Encampment for Citizenship. Included is an announcement of the 1966 "encampments." They are particularly interested in recruiting Negro youngsters from the South Recruiting -- and perhaps subsidizing -- one or more applicants would make a good project for a local council. Any help will be appreciated

RE: Book Distribution

Those who were at the last meeting of the state council directors may recall mention of the possibility of making books (mostly paperbacks) available to the poor, both in cities and rural areas, through state and local human relations councils.

Among the possibilities would be setting up reading centers as a project for local councils, placing books in logical places which already exist, or starting a mail-order lending library either out of the state office or local councils

The Fund for the Advancement of Education, which is interested in this project, also has in mind encouragement of ownership of books -- perhaps through sale at a considerable loss. However, I do not know the details about this part of the proposition, and Paul, who started the negotiations with them is out of town.

The important thing at the moment is to let us know if you are at all interested in any such program Could your chapters get books to children who do not otherwise have access to them? Do you see program possibilities in this? Can it be tied in with the R A P in Georgia, Alabama, South Carolina, and Florida?

So far we have had no reaction. Unless we hear from some of you within the next ten days or so, we shall have to drop the whole idea Personally, I think it has real possibilities. Are you interested in further exploration?

RE: Fieldtrip to New Orleans, 2/15-18/66

The National Social Welfare Assembly

The sole purpose of this one-day regional consultation of the N.S.W.A. was to discuss needed changes in the scope, functions, memberships, structural and operating relationships and image of the N.S.W.A. This meeting, like 4 others around the country was set up by Greenleigh Associates, Inc., a firm of management consultants retained by the N.S.W.A. (See attached discussion guide.)

There seemed to be a concensus that the expansion of federal government programs and planning called for some national planning and coordinating agency. I had the uneasy feeling, however, that many - if not most - of those present were thinking in terms of the interests of the "welfare industry." Within the limits of the modesty appropriate to a newcomer, I pumped for an emphasis on urban planning and community organization as perhaps the key problems, Professor Hall Bronfin of the University of Georgia School of Social Work joined forces with me on this. But the group as a whole seemed more concerned about whether they should have a Washington office and to what extent the N.S.W.A. could and should take positions and make pronouncements for the member agencies.

Some new acquaintances could be helpful. Bronfin, Walter Chevers of Morehouse, Harvey Reams of the New Orleans Urban League, and Victor Bussie of the Louisiana AFL-CIO - who was a buddy-buddy to "Ole Earl."

The Louisiana Council on Human Relations

I talked to Helen Mervis, then visited Dr. Oliver and Fr. Segun in Lafayette, and stayed for a meeting of the New Orleans Community Relations Council Board. (At which there was no quorum - only four women and myself. Mardi Gras, you know.)

Helen's initial position was that, in order to persuade the N.O. group to affiliate with and support the L.C.H.R., not only would the office have to be located in N.O., but also they would want some rather explicit delineation of the services they could expect from the director. That first evening I talked against any notion of a dual responsibility, arguing that a man could answer to only one policy board and that his presence in N.O. would assure them of more-than- ordinary attention. She seemed convinced, but wanted me to stay for the Board meeting.

In Lafayette I learned that the idea of locating the office in N.O. was unthinkable. Oliver had Lafayette in mind. (Strongly in mind) In the end he allowed that "Baton Rouge might be a good compromise." He even stated that they would go along with anything to get a staff. But it was quite clear that the southwest Louisiana crowd saw no possibility that a N.O. location would work. They argued - with some accuracy, I think - that the N.O. group had actually done very little, had not affiliated with or paid dues to L.C.H.R., that the new man probably would be absorbed by N.O. despite all intentions to the contrary - and that the rest of the state would perceive this to be the case, whether it was or not.

Before the attempted Board meeting of the C.R.C., I interviewed an Episcopal minister whom Helen had suggested as a possible candidate. His name is Prim Smith. He is about 40, but looks younger. His family moved to N.O. from Florida while he was in high school, and he went to Tulane. He has a degree in law and practiced in N.O. for two years before going to seminary in California. Even while in seminary he worked summers for the Justice Department. He was very much interested and he impressed me as being exceptionally well-qualified for the job, temperamentally as well as by training and background. However, he indicated that he would need more than the usual starting salary because of his family (4 children) and indebtedness resulting from his seminary years. (He was simply being frank with me and realistic with himself - this was not dickering.) Also, wearing his clerical garb seems important to him; he said he would be more inclined to take such a job if he could continue to do so. Finally, he would not be in a position to move because of a peculiarity about the deal he made with his church to buy the house in which he is living. Surprisingly, however, his sympathies were with Dr. Oliver on the city-vs provinces controversy. He thought Oliver's fears were "justified by history" and seemed to grasp fully the necessity of careful attention to upstate Louisiana. He indicated a willingness to travel extensively to do them a good job, and felt that he could win confidence upstate within a few months.

The women present at the Board meeting agreed that a determined effort should be made to affiliate C.R.C. with L.C.H.R. immediately and without regard to location of the office. (I simply asked them to consider the alternative the office definitely located in Baton Rouge, with the director working around C.R.C. instead of through C.R.C. in New Orleans.) They are going to ask Dr. Oliver to come to a meeting to discuss affiliation and then, hopefully, send a delegation to a meeting of the L.C.H.R. Board to ask affiliation. However, Helen Mervis still thinks her Board will will need a hand selling the job.

Meanwhile, I think I am going to ask Dr. Oliver and Fr. Segur to invite Prim Smith to Lafayette for an interview. I am "High" on Smith and believe that we might be able to sell a N.O. location on the basis of the availability of this man. Further his attitude and comprehension are such that he may very well win over Oliver and Segur. And I believe he would pay for himself although he comes at a higher price.

Apart from Prim Smith, or the unlikely possibility of another equally attractive candidate available only in New Orleans, I am convinced that it would be a mistake to locate the office in New Orleans. I would recommend location in Baton Rouge. And I doubt that a decision to do so would reduce support from New Orleans to any great degree. There really is not much there to be reduced?

Dear Mr. Hester:

The Southern Regional Council is continually searching for able men to suggest to the state councils on Human Relations for available staff positions. Mr. Baxton Bryant, Director of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations, has said that you would be exceptionally well-qualified for one of these positions, although he had no idea whether or not you might be interested.

This is to ask if you would be at all interested in exploring the possibility of a position similar to Baxton's in another state? If so, I would be happy to write in more detail and to send information on the Southern Regional Council and the state councils and would welcome your biographical data.

I would appreciate hearing from you at your convenience.

Cordially,

MEMORANDUM

TO: State Council Directors

FROM: Ed Stanfield

It occurs to me that, because S.R.C. has started paying transportation to most of the meetings for state staffs, there may have been some misunderstanding about the invitation to the luncheon at which Attorney General Katzenbach will speak on Monday, February 28. S.R.C. does not offer to pay travel expenses to Atlanta for this affair.

Please let us know, via air mail, if this affects your decision.

Dear Ed:

I plan to attend the Feb. 28 luncheon at the Marriott to hear Attorney General Katzenbach.

Thanks for the invitation.

ADDRESS

by

ATTORNEY GENERAL NICHOLAS deB. KATZENBACH

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

Marriott Motel, Atlanta, Georgia

Monday, February 28, 1966

I.

I thank you for the honor you pay me in inviting me here. But it is, rather, for me to honor you, the Southern Regional Council, for more than two decades of careful, courageous, and consistent devotion to the afflictions and the aspirations of the South.

The increasing commitment of the nation toward both the humanity and the rightfulness of human rights is in no small part the result of your activity and I am pleased to join with you.

We are seeing that commitment accelerate almost daily. Indeed, even within the past year, we have witnessed a quiet revolution.

A year ago, our attention was fastened on what was, in some areas, perhaps the only type of democratic expression possible for Negroes -- demonstrations in the streets. Today, we join to devote still broader concern to the scope and speed with which Negroes can now exercise the basic form of democratic expression -- the vote.

The vote, indeed, is so basic that some regard it as a small, even a cheap right -- to be defaulted lightly. But that small, cheap right can change a region -- and a nation. And it is that high purpose that joins us together now.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 issued three commands.

One is to local officials. It is neither revolutionary nor difficult. It is simply: register all voter applicants freely, fairly, and conveniently, and permit them to vote in the same way.

The second command is to the federal government. It says: where local officials do not do so, it is the government's responsibility to supply federal representatives who will.

And finally, the message of the Act to the leaders and supporters of the movement for equal rights is: you will be able to register and vote in the next election, but it is you who must do so.

We gather today at the confluence of all three streams. Individually, each can have effect. But it is only by their convergence that we can surely bring on the pent-up tide of participation, power, and responsibility that give meaning and worth to democracy.

II.

In some parts of the South, the right of all citizens to vote was acknowledged, accepted, and freely acted on long before August, 1965. The aim of the new law was already fact.

In other areas, where discrimination in voting had been practiced, the requirements of the Act are being obeyed.

Under the Voting Rights Act, local officials had, by February 1, registered more than 56,000 Negro voters in Alabama, 53,000 in Louisiana, 51,000 in Mississippi, 24,000 in South Carolina, and 17,000 in Georgia. The total Negro registration as a result of voluntary compliance hence exceeds 200,000.

But there are still other areas where the response has been grudging, token compliance, areas where even public officials have put maintaining the old ways above maintaining the law. It is they who make necessary the second command of the Voting Rights Act.

The responsibility of the federal government under the Act is to insure full compliance with the right to vote. We have acted on that command.

In some counties, for example, registrars began to treat Negro applicants fairly in other respects but continued to apply literacy tests. This is not full compliance with the law; it suspends the imposition of a literacy standard on Negroes now by counties which rarely if ever imposed it on whites in the past.

Where this has been the case, we have dispatched federal voting examiners.

In other counties, local registrars have dealt fairly with Negro applicants and have abandoned use of literacy tests. But despite the new Act, they have continued infrequent or inconvenient registration schedules.

This is not full compliance with the law, or even with the basic responsibilities of any registrar to provide reasonable access, not merely to meet minimum requirements. Where this has been the case we have dispatched federal examiners -- and will, if necessary, send more.

As I noted in letters recently to all registrars affected by the Act, the criterion is simple. Registrars should stay open often enough to make registration easy. In normal times, normal hours suffice. But these are not normal times. Negroes, long deprived of free opportunities to register, now seek to do so.

Registration officials should take affirmative steps to meet this demand, the product of decades of past discrimination. And there is much they can do -- add registration clerks, extend hours, increas the number of registration sites, and publicize the times and the free opportunity to register.

The vote, after all, is not a privilege, to be stingily dispensed. It is a right, to be made available freely. Where local officials do not thus take steps to make registration and voting accessible, it is my duty to do so.

A major case in point is Birmingham -- Jefferson County, Alabama. Registration officials there were not discriminating against individual applicants. They dropped the literacy test. But they responded only grudgingly to the fact that 90,000 Negroes were not registered and under the Act should have been free to do so.

After discussions with the Department of Justice beginning early in December, they took some steps to increase registration capacity, but even these fell far short. More than half the unregistered Negroes in the county still would not have had even an opportunity to apply for registration before the deadline for the May 3 Alabama primary.

Nonetheless, the local officials would take no further steps to increase access -- steps they have taken in the past to meet heavy white registration demand.

The result, five weeks ago, was the appointment of federal examiners. As many as 20 examiners have been working in Jefferson County, first in three locations and now in eight.

The result of accelerated local registration coupled now with examiners has been striking. When President Johnson signed the Voting Rights Act last August 6, there were 26,255 Negroes registered in Jefferson County--22.6 percent of the voting-age Negro population.

On January 17, the day I designated Jefferson County for examiners, there were 41,930 Negroes registered--36.1 percent. Today, the figure exceeds 58,000 and the percentage exceeds 50 percent.

Overall, examiners working in Birmingham and in 36 other counties have now registered more than 100,000 Negro citizens. Added to the more than 200,000 registered voluntarily by local officials, the total number of Negroes now registered in Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Georgia, and South Carolina exceeds 900,000, nearly 40 percent of those eligible.

I hope and expect that by the time of the next election in each of these states, more than half of the voting-age Negro population will register--and will vote.

III.

Full and fair opportunity to register need not mean that the registrar's office must be thronged at every hour of every day. At the same time, no amount of accessibility can provide more than opportunity.

Thus it was that President Johnson articulated the third command of the Voting Rights Act when he signed it last August:

"Presidents and Congresses, laws and lawsuits, can open the doors to the polling places....But only the individual Negro, and all others who have been denied the right to vote, can really walk through those doors and can use that right and can transform the vote into an instrument of justice and fulfillment."

The degree and energy with which the leaders of the movement for equal rights have recognized and acted on the truth of those words is evident.

I think, for example, of Dallas County, Alabama, where between 1954 and 1962 only 12 Negroes were registered. But the Negroes of the county kept on trying to register--some of them 18, 19, 20 times.

A major factor in their spirit was the group of young people who came to Selma in early 1963 to help in registration drives--and who stayed. The momentum they gave has borne fruit. Within weeks after federal examiners were sent to Dallas County last August, Negro registration went from 1,400 to more than 7,000. Now it is over 10,000 and nearing 70 percent.

I think of Albert Turner, one of twelve children of a Perry County, Alabama sharecropper who gave up his trade to begin a voter registration drive. After months of effort, there were still less than 500 Negroes registered. But now there are more than 3,300 registered because the cases that grew out of Albert Turner's work were among the principal models for the Voting Rights Act.

I think of the last Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council, which resulted in the registration of some 700,000 Negroes in 11 states. The success of that project seems even more remarkable considering that it came entirely before the Voting Rights Act struck down so many of the barriers.

And finally, even though we have taken Wiley Branton away from you, I think of the new Voter Education Project on which you have now embarked. Its need is great and, with the assistance of the Voting Rights Act, its potential is outstanding.

In many counties, discrimination has ended and Negroes have registered in a flood, even without examiners. But in many other counties, discrimination has ended and Negro registration has remained a trickle.

--In Calhoun County, South Carolina, for example, Negro registration has increased since the Act from 14 to 44 percent. But in Anderson County, it has increased from 27.3 percent to only 28 percent.

--In Choctaw County, Alabama, Negro registration has increased by 1,600, to 63 percent. But in Chambers County, it has increased only 200, to only 18 percent.

In these and many other counties, it is not the presence or absence of federal examiners that makes the difference. Indeed, extremes nearly as great can be shown among counties to which examiners have been sent.

For example, examiners have made a spectacular difference in West Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, where the percentage of Negroes registered has gone from 2 percent to 79 percent. But what of East Feliciana Parish, which also has examiners, but which has gaone from 3 percent to only 36 percent?

Even the federal and local registration figures within a single county can be instructive. In Coahoma County, Mississippi, for example, federal examiners have registered 3,100 Negroes. But meanwhile, local officials who had enrolled only a thousand prior to the 1965 Act, have now registered 2,300 more.

To illustrate my point in still another way, only a handful of Negroes were registered in East Carroll Parish, Louisiana, before examiners were sent. Now the total is 2,696. But we did not send examiners to adjacent Madison Parish. It also had only a token number of Negroes registered -- and now there are 2,666.

The lesson of these statistics -- and of like figures in scores of other counties -- is that it is neither local compliance nor federal examiners which makes the crucial difference.

As the sustained efforts of this Council and the organizations represented here today make clear, the most important generating factor is local organization. Counties which have seen extensive Negro registration, whether by local officials or by federal examiners, are counties in which registration campaigns have been conducted. In counties without such campaigns, even the presence of examiners has been of limited gain.

Surely part of the reason for slight registration in a number of areas is evident. Negroes may be formally, legally free to register, but fear remains, fear well-based on past experience and present threats.

One answer is federal action -- of the kind we already have taken in court and will, in all likelihood take in the future, not only regarding registration, but also regarding the still more damaging intimidation that can occur at election time.

As I observed to an Emancipation Day ceremony in Mobile last month, I have a message for those who may think of trying to frighten or coerce Negro citizens -- or any citizens -- from trying to register or vote. If you do, you will have the federal government to reckon with.

The still more effective antidote to intimidation, however, flows directly from energetic registration efforts and that is numbers. Two men or twenty men can be threatened, fired, or harassed; but not a thousand. Not only is it impossible to intimidate large numbers, but large-scale exercise of the vote changes the attitudes that might otherwise breed intimidation.

IV.

We have, so far, seen substantial gains. The number of Negroes registered in the five states principally affected by the Voting Rights Act has increased from 588,000 to more than 900,000. It is even possible for us to look back over this gain and tell ourselves how far we have come.

But what these figures more surely reflect is how far there is still to go. For more than half the adult Negroes of the South still are not participating in this most basic act of citizenship. None of us can be satisfied until they do.

And so I come today to congratulate you -- and the foundations which have provided such necessary and responsible support -- for undertaking this new Voter Education Project.

I know you face intricate and widespread problems. Registration, after all, is only the first of many steps. Unless it is to be a hollow exercise, it must be followed by voting.

That may be a painfully obvious relationship to someone who has voted often and freely in the past. It may not be so obvious to a Negro sharecropper who has never before entered a polling place and who has never before had to study a ballot.

Stimulating registration must be supplemented by mobilization of registered but reluctant voters. Both must be supplemented by education of those to whom the mechanics of the political process are strange. And all require local organization of the kind so successfully built by the last VEP.

At the same time, the effect of organization, education, and mobilization is not limited to potential voters. What may be quite as significant is the educational impact on the teachers -- the hundreds and even thousands of workers, paid and unpaid, who are the foundation of VEP. Their work is a signal reflection of the duties of citizenship. It is also a lesson in responsible local leadership.

This is leadership that must go beyond voting, beyond solely Negro interests and extend to strengthening the capacities of every community in the South.

The goal, after all, of our efforts under the Voting Rights Act and your efforts in undertakings like the Voter Education Project is not mere numbers. The day of equality will not come merely when Negroes can and do vote freely throughout the South, nor when they elect Negro candidates just because they are Negro. There would be little majesty in an equality that is so superficial.

The concerns of the past have been almost exclusively racial -- and understandably so. Leslie Dunbar has written, "Race so undercuts and overhangs every Southern problem that none can be rationally treated without first wresting it from enslavement to a debilitating system of race relations."

But we are, even now, arriving at the time when the civil rights movement can and should turn from protest to affirmation, from a force against discrimination to a major affirmative force in the life not only of the Negroes of the South but of all the South.

We are, even now, approaching the time when Southerners can and should join, not as Negroes and whites, but as progressive men to forge progressive answers to common problems.

"Freedom is a good horse," Matthew Arnold wrote, "but a horse to ride somewhere."

Best wishes
Nellie McKeyth

FIELD ACTIVITIES NEWSLETTER

Is a "Field Activities Newsletter" a good idea? We've been toying with the notion for some time and decided to try one or two. We don't know for sure what all we want to put in it, who we want to send it to, how often it should be written, or whether it is worth the effort. But from time to time there are bits of news or good ideas or useful information that we would like to pass on,--mostly to the staffs of the state councils on human council presidents, and perhaps to the SRC Board members and maybe state council staffers can let us know if you would like to select a few others to get it--like members of your Board and/or local council presidents.

New Names and Faces in Tennessee

Among the first new staffers to be employed under the expanded grant-in-aid program are Mr. and Mrs. Harry A. Wiersema, who have joined the staff of the Tennessee Council. Actually, they were not "Mr. and Mrs. Wiersema" until after they started working for the TCHR. Baxton Bryant writes, "The Council has already had a wonderful effect on this fine young couple. Their marriage was performed by me in my home last Saturday." That's a wonderful effect, all right!

Mrs. Wiersema was Jerry Jolene Williams, a twenty-seven year old native Tennesseean. She has a B.S. from Middle Tennessee State, where she was in Who's Who in American Universities and Colleges, and lacks her thesis for a Master's in sociology from the University of Tennessee. For the past couple of years she has been working for the Metropolitan Action Commission (Nashville's community action agency) and the State Planning Commission. Her duties included research on poverty in Tennessee, community organization, and preparation of proposals for the poverty program.

Harry was born in Knoxville and is likewise twenty-seven. He holds a B.S. in Mechanical Engineering and also has done work toward a Master's degree in sociology at the university. Before joining the TCHR staff he was Assistant Coordinator of the Neighborhood Youth Corps in Nashville. On the side he is a genius with office equipment and photographic equipment.

Both Harry and Jerry have been active in civil rights,--and there is no denying their commitment. Needless to say, the TCHR could not offer them, finance~~-and-security-wise~~, anything like their combined compensation from their former jobs. We don't think they would mind our quoting from a letter they wrote to the TCHR Board in connection with their application:

> ...For some time we have worked in the war on poverty, and we have been disillusioned with the progress made there and in other areas of human relations.
> We have come to see how much progress toward these ideals can be made by one man who is independent, with the help and support from concerned members of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations.

Personnel Changes in Arkansas

Beginning June 1, Nat Griswold, Executive Director of the Arkansas Council from its beginning, will lay down his accustomed duties to write a book about the Little Rock school crisis. After that he will retire to the family farm. He will be succeeded as Executive Director by Ozell Sutton, long-time Associate Director of the Council.

Taking Ozell's place as Associate Director will be the Reverend J. Harold Jackson, presently Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of North Little Rock. Harold was born in New Orleans and holds a B.S. degree from L.S. U. and a B.D. degree from Union Theological Seminary in Richmond, Virginia. He has served churches in Jennings, Louisiana, and Helena, Arkansas, besides his present pastorate. He has served for the past year as Moderator of the Synod of Arkansas, Presbyterian Church, U.S. His wife is the former Sarah Wakeman of Baton Rouge. They have three children.

Executive Director for the Louisiana Council

Beginning in June the Louisiana Council will have an Executive Director. The position has been accepted by Mrs. Patricia B. Miller, a resident of Baton Rouge (where the office is to be).

Mrs. Miller grew up in Ohio and did her undergraduate work at West Virginia State College. She took a M.A. degree in Health and Physical Education from the University of Iowa. She has worked for the Urban League in Chicago and as a physical education instructor at Samuel Huston College, West Virginia State, and Southern University. For the past nine years she has operated a real estate and contracting business, building (so we are told) some of the loveliest new homes in Baton Rouge and New Orleans.

But Mrs. Miller wanted to help people in a less impersonal way. So she entered the graduate school of Southern University and in June will receive a M.A. degree in Guidance.

Mrs. Miller strikes one as a poised and quietly determined woman. We predict that she will do an outstanding job as Director of the LCHR. And most certainly we wish her well.

Leadership Conferences in Mississippi

Ken Dean of the MCHR has been the prime convener of a couple of meetings which he hopes will get on some sort of regular basis as a Mississippi Leadership Conference. As we get the picture, this is intended to be a Mississippi version of the Southern Interagency Conference.

After discussing the idea with eight or ten of the more active leaders in the areas of race relations and poverty programs, Ken set a date and invited about twenty-five organizations to send representatives. The list included all major civil rights groups, as well as women's organizations and some of the church groups. About 34 people showed up at the first meeting.

The reaction of participants at the initial meeting was good. Besides the obvious sharing of ideas and problems, Ken sees the Leadership Conference as helping to clear up misunderstandings and giving some of the church groups and women's groups contact with the more active civil rights people. (Ken thinks this aspect of the idea might be even more fruitful in other states.)

"The most difficult part of this type of program," Ken writes, "is to get an open date."

We are not astonished.

Board, Local Council Leaders Meet in Florida

On May 6 and 7, August VandenBosche brought together his Board and the principal officers of each local council for a conference which included briefing on the financial structure and requirements of the council and program at both the state and local level. Paul Anthony and I went down for this meeting, which was held in Orlando. We felt that it was very helpful toward getting all concerned to "understand the situation." It was also a good way to get a lot of program information and ideas across.

The Arkansas Council is planning a similar meeting for June 10.

A Local Council Program We Like

The Augusta (Georgia) Council on Human Relations has established a listing service for open housing. The plan is to list houses available to be bought, sold, or rented on a non-discriminatory basis. They want only to bring buyer and seller together, of course, and will not be serving as brokers.

The group has secured a small office and a telephone. Volunteers man the phone. A small ad is carried in the classified section from time to time. Besides answering the phone, the volunteers call people who advertise in the paper to see if the unit is available on a non-discriminatory basis.

ADL Publication Ordered for State Councils

Countering Extremism, which gives how-to-do-it help on organizing a community to counter increasing influence by radical-right organizations, is soon to be published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith. As promised at our last meeting of the state councils' staffs, we have ordered a number of copies sent to each state council. They will find these useful from time to time.

Don't Forget...

...the Community Leadership Development Workshop at the Sheraton-

Emory Inn in Atlanta, July 24-31. Send in your application, if you plan to go. Let me know that you are going to attend, so that we can plan our next state councils' staff meeting accordingly.

Late News Flashes!

Mr. William C. Allred, Jr., will become Executive Director of the North Carolina Council on Human Relations in July. Mr. Allred, a resident of Greensboro, is a graduate of Wake Forest College and next month will receive the M.A. degree from Emory University, Atlanta, in the field of history. His thesis: "The Southern Regional Council, 1943-1961."

For the past four years Mr. Allred has been employed in the actuarial and contract departments of Pilot Life Insurance Company in Greensboro. He is married and has two daughters, ages 6 and 2.

The Annual Meeting of the Southern Regional Council will be held on November 16, 17, and 18 this year. Please mark your calendar. Plans are incomplete, of course, but we hope this year to make presentation of state council affairs an integral part of the meeting, --instead of having it before the SRC meeting.

More Staff Changes

It must be the season as well as our expansion on "all fronts". The staff changes, both in the state councils and SRC, are coming so fast that it is getting difficult to keep up!

The Arkansas Council has named Mr. Elijah Coleman to be their Associate Director. (Nat Griswold has been asked to return to his post as Executive Director until his replacement can be found.) Mr. Coleman has been principal of Townsend Park School in Pine Bluff since 1954. From 1959 through 1961 he was President of the Arkansas Teachers Association. He has also served as Chairman of the Pine Bluff Fellowship, an interorganization association of Negro professional workers for community progress. He is a native of Smackover, Arkansas, a graduate of Philander Smith College in Little Rock, and holds a Master of Education degree from the University of Arkansas. Mr. Coleman is married and has a 15-year-old son and a 10-year-old daughter.

Robert Alexander has resigned as Executive Director of the Houston Council on Human Relations. He has returned to Los Angeles. His successor has not yet been named.

Changes at Southern Regional Council

Sam Adams, Director of Research at SRC, has resigned to take up studies at the University of Wisconsin this fall. He is the recipient of a Russell Sage Foundation fellowship.

Edwyn E. Lewis will leave SRC August 19 in order to return to Miami's sun and sand and a management job with the community action agency of Miami's anti-poverty program.

On the additions side we have Miss Susan Bresler, who will work as an associate to Moreland Smith in our special project on housing and urban planning. Miss Bresler holds a B.S. in City Planning from the University of Illinois. She has worked as an intern in the planning departments of Champaign and Moline, Illinois, and with the Northeastern Illinois Planning Commission. Before coming to SRC she had been employed for a year in the Community Planning Division, Planning and Industrial Development Board, State of Alabama.

As for secretaries, we note the loss of Jerry Gimarc from the Housing and Urban Planning Project and Joan Browning from the Labor Project. Of particular interest to state council folks is the employment of Mrs. Mary Lee McCallister as secretary to the Director of Field Activities. Her experience includes thirteen years as a secretary with General Electric in Atlanta and four years with the American Red Cross in Chamblee.

Books For Equal Education

Books for Equal Education is a joint project of the United States National Student Association and the United State Youth Council. It is a non-profit, charitable organization engaged in distribution of college texts and fiction to unaccredited Negro colleges in the southeastern region. The book distribution office is located in Atlanta.

Many of the books received by BEE are not suitable for use at the college level, but are in good condition and perhaps could be utilized in other areas. These materials include: texts in mathematics, science, English and social studies at both the elementary and secondary levels; juvenile fiction; pre-school reading pamphlets and other similar materials. Suggested uses might be: adult literacy programs, Head Start projects, community libraries, and the like. Those interested in the books for such purposes should be forewarned that many of the texts are out-of-date. However, the books have been "culled," so that the ones offered are in good condition -- and many are definitely "quality" books.

There is NO CHARGE for the books, but the recipient is responsible for transportation of them from Atlanta to their final destination. Interested persons should write for a copy of the BEE guidelines. The address is: Shawn Boles, Southern Director Books for Equal Education, 416 Marietta Street, N. W., Atlanta, Georgia, 30303.

Leadership Training Laboratory at Emory

Most of the state council directors took SRC up on an offer to pay tuition for them to attend a week-long leadership training laboratory at Emory University in Atlanta. The dates were July 24-31, and those attending were Pat Miller of Louisiana, Ken Dean of Mississippi, Jerry Roden of Alabama, Alice Spearman of South Carolina, Will Allred of North Carolina, Bob Combs of Virginia, and Ed Stanfield. Baxton Bryant of Tennessee came, but had to leave after only one day because of a death in his family.

The laboratory was sponsored jointly by Emory University and Georgia State College in cooperation with National Training Laboratories. Focusing on the process of group action and the dynamics of interpersonal relations, the laboratory was designed to make participants more aware of the bearing of personal, human problems on group functioning. The week was harrowing (not to say "hairy") at times, as everybody sought to figure out why everybody else behaved so oddly. Folks leveled as well as reveled with one another. One comes away from such an experience with the feeling that he gained something important -- but that only time will tell just what!

Incidentally, the faculty included two mental health men, one psychologist, one social psychologist, and a consultant in human relations. Seems like the weight given to mental health and psychology says something about somebody's conception of the meaning of leadership in southern communities these days!

State Council Directors Meet

The state council directors met in Atlanta on August 9 and 10. Primary purpose of the meeting was to iron out some communication problems we have had in getting local councils informed of the program help now available from SRC. A six-page descriptive catalogue was prepared and discussed and is now being distributed to the state councils in sufficient quantity to promote the programs extensively in each state. In the process the group had opportunity to clarify many points in conference with the special project directors. Next meeting of the directors is scheduled for September 21 and 22.

Random Notes

...On the morning of August 10 a delegation from the Georgia Council on Human Relations had an interview with Governor Carl Sanders. Among other things they urged him to employ a special assistant concerned with civil rights and to establish a civil rights division of the state attorney general's office. They pointed out discriminatory practices of the State Patrol and the Georgia Bureau of Investigation. They also reminded the governor and, through press coverage, the public that no Negroes sit on the following state boards: Education, Regents, Corrections, Pardons and Paroles, Game and Fish Commission, Veterans Service, Personnel, Industry and Trade, State Medical Examination, and State Scholarship Commission. There may not be immediate results, but this strikes me as a good piece of work nevertheless. We get so accustomed to the southern landscape that even people of good will do not notice so glaring an injustice as the omission of Negroes from practically every state board and agency. Surely one of the most important tasks of every human relations council is to keep nagging officials and the public about this kind of matter-of-fact outrage.

...Speaking of never-ending tasks, I had occasion not long ago to ask Mrs. H. A. Pfiffner, President of the League of Women Voters of Georgia, how they managed to get objective studies and reports with volunteer workers. Her reply read, in part: "Most local and state Leagues have regular observers at official boards and commissions--at every open meeting--at budget hearings, etc. It is surprising how much one can learn from regular attendance and careful listening to aid in factual evaluation." It occurred to me that if every local council did nothing else but assign a couple of people to monitor every meeting of (1) their city council, (2) their board of education, (3) their county commission, and (4) their police or recorder's court, their existence would be justified. Why not make this "standard operational procedure"?

...Project SPEED-UP roars on in South Carolina under the leadership of Brad Posten, who is the project director. Brad has completed his year as an Eleanor Roosevelt Intern with the South Carolina Council. He writes, "The project has met with great response from the communities and over 2,000 children and adults are enrolled in the twenty-eight centers."

...We keep finding out about really great things that are being done quietly by human relations councils. Johnny Carlisle of the Youth Council on Human Relations, affiliated with the Palm Beach chapter of the Florida Council, wrote the other day, seeking just $150.00 to buy materials for their second "Summer Tutorial and Enrichment Program." Twenty-two young people, including advanced high school students, high school graduates, and junior college students, are tutoring 91 children, aged 4 to 13, who live in the vicinity of Pleasant Heights Baptist Church, which is their center. They have tutoring classes in reading, math, geography, history, science, arts and crafts, and music. And field trips include the zoo, the Junior Museum of Science, Norton Art Gallery, "and other points of interest." All these young folks needed was a little financial assistance and the continuing interest and advice of the council board. Mrs. R. W. Glasner, chapter president, and Mrs. W. Fred Ellington, work closely with them.

...The Virginia Council is putting major emphasis this year on intercultural (multi-ethnic) textbooks for use in public schools. The Council took cognizance of the fact that Virginia's children, Negro or white, could easily graduate from high school, using the texts approved by the Virginia Board of Education, without knowing that Negroes had made any significant contribution to the life and history of America. Further, they discovered that many textbooks are published in two versions: one with biracial illustrations and another lily white. VCHR has just published an attractive printing of its review of Virginia textbooks, including suggested courses of action, and a catalogue of intercultural texts available.

September 8, 1966

TO: State Council Directors

FROM: Ed Stanfield

SUBJECT: Next Meeting of State Council Directors

As you know, our next meeting is to be September 21-22, starting at 2:00 on Wednesday and ending about noon on Thursday. We shall meet in the S. R. C. conference room.

The Southern Interagency Conference will be meeting from 2:00 on the 20th until noon on the 21st, and you are invited to attend that meeting also. It might be of considerable interest to you. Dr. Lewis Killian of the University of Florida will speak on the first afternoon on the role of white liberals in social change in the South. Other features of that meeting will be briefings on the political situation by Vernon Jordan and on school and hospital desegregation by representatives of the regional office of H. E. W. (The latter presentation will be on Wednesday morning, so you might catch that even if you can't come on Tuesday.)

For our own meeting, following the suggestion of some of you, I have invited two men from government agencies here to talk to us about program concerns and the role of their offices. They are Bob Thompson, Special Assistant for Intergroup Relations to the Regional Director of the Department of Housing and Urban Development; and Don Hollowell, Regional Director of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. In addition, we may have the H. E. W. representatives stay over from the S. I. C. meeting - in case some of you can't get here early.

As for expenses, let us try the following formula: S. R. C. will pay one-half of your expenses for travel, room and meals, plus all travel cost in excess of $50.00. In this way the distance some have to travel will not be an excessive burden. We can make any adjustments in this formula after trying it once.

I am going to leave it to you to get your own accommodations, so that you can order exactly the room you want. Since most seemed satisfied with the Americana Motor Hotel, let me suggest that one. Perhaps I'll arrange a dinner for us there on the evening of the 21st.

Dear Dr. Blackwell,

Lately I have heard much about the vigorous and forthright stand taken by Mr. William J. Page, Jr. (F.U. '48) in decisions he had to make as Regional Director of the U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Atlanta, Georgia. From those who know of his work, I hear that his decisions on school desegregation and Medicare compliance have brought severe pressure from racists in his area, and these friends urge all who approve of his stand to let the fact be known.

Perhaps Furman could take some public and private steps to encourage Mr. Page in this critical period.

A Council to attain the ideals and practices of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South

FIELD ACTIVITIES NEWSLETTER
December 27, 1966

New SRC Publications

Our mail room is a study in creative disarray these days as the Southern Regional Council is issuing a rash of new publications.

Our Voter Education Project has recently put out a county-by-county list of registration figures covering the whole South, with figures for the white voting age population, Negro voting-age population, number of each group registered, and percentages registered. They have also published an eight-page mimeographed analysis of the November election results, focusing on participation of Negroes and its effect, titled "What Happened in the South, 1966." (The VEP has been responsible for programs through which 100,000 voters have been registered during the past year.)

"School Desegregation 1966: The Slow Undoing" is just off the press. A "Special Report," it tells the dismal story of the South's all-too-successful efforts to avoid significant integration of its school systems. It estimates that ten to twelve percent of Negro students in the South are in schools with whites, with figures like 2% for Mississippi, 2.9% for Louisiana, and 2.4% for Alabama offset by 34.6% in Texas and 21.9% in Tennessee.

"Public Assistance in the South," another Special Report, points out that 21.8% of all expenditures for public assistance payments occurred in the South, reflecting the South's 25.9% of the population. But nearly half of the poor people of the nation are in the South. Another fact brought out is far more is spent in the South on aid to the aged than on aid to dependent children -- despite the fact that there are many more impoverished children than impoverished elderly people. This reflects the political utility of aid to the voting elderly. This report is loaded with information. For instance, although I suppose I knew it all along, it came as a bit of a shock to me to see from one of the tables provided that, among 50 states and the District of Columbia, Georgia, North Carolina, Louisiana, Tennessee, Kentucky, Alabama, South Carolina, Arkansas, and Mississippi rank 42nd, 43rd, 45th, 46th, 47th, 48th, 49th, 50th, and 51st, respectively, in per capita income! That's what I like about the South -- we're consistent.

And then there is the excellent publication of our Special Project in Housing and Urban Planning, "A Home of Our Own: A Guide for Home Buyers." (In the light of those per capita income figures, that title almost sounds like a cruelty joke!) It has a chapter on the advantages and disadvantages of buying a home, one on what to look for in shopping for a home, another on "Closing the Deal," and a chapter on breaking racial barriers. There is a glossary of terms and a list of helpful pamphlets and articles.

"State Councils' Dinner" at the SRC Annual Meeting

For the benefit of readers who were not there, I want to tell briefly about the "State Councils' Dinner" which was a feature of the Southern Regional Council's Annual Meeting in November. All of the executive directors and the president or vice-president of each state council were present and seated at the head tables. The program was quite simple, consisting of presentation of the George Mitchell Award (for largest percentage increase in membership) to the Arkansas Council by Mr. Marion Wright and the field activities report. A few statistics from the latter:

"...Membership now stands at approximately 11,500, and increase of some 23% over last year. Percentage increases ranged from five percent in Virginia, which is the largest of the councils, to ninety-five percent in Arkansas, which heretofore had been one of the smallest. The Alabama Council, which won the Mitchell Award last year, increased its membership another ten percent this year. Tennessee registers a thirteen percent increase and South Carolina a jump of twenty-three percent. The North Carolina Council shows a 57% increase. And Georgia deserves special commendation for raising its membership enrollment by 53%, although starting from a relatively large base of more than a thousand members."

"At the height of their strength the state councils had this year 26 full-time professional employees, an increase of 18% over last year. Part-time and clerical staffs have increased proportionately."

"The councils have raised about $120,000 from their members and friends -- an increase of 20%. At the same time the total of their operating budgets has passed $400,00 -- a leap of more than 25%."

The Paperback Books Project

It took a little while for the word to get out, apparently, but during the past couple of months we have had a tremendous increase in the number of inquiries about our Paperback Books Project and requests for books. In fact, the demand has been so great that it is necessary to delay further orders until the backlog is diminished and we can assess the situation. It is our hope that the proposals we are receiving, even if we are not able to answer them affirmatively at this time, will help us to secure funds for a renewed and enlarged program in 1967.

Notes on the State Councils

I have let so much time elapse since my last newsletter, and the state councils have been doing so much meanwhile, that I cannot begin to do them all justice. I'll have to mention only a few items of particular interest.

The Arkansas Council has secured a Research Assistant, Mr. Paul Williams, who joined their staff on September 26. Mr. Williams was born and raised in Fort Smith. He recently was graduated from Hendrix College in Conway, where he majored in history and political science. He did the research for the Arkansas Council's "Background Report on Arkansas Prisons" and is working with a penal reform group which the Council helped to set up. He is also working with students and local councils.

I don't ordinarily like to receive unsigned letters, but a recent one was a pleasure. Signed only "A(rkansas)CHR," it said only, "It appears that Human Relations are improving in Arkansas. What about Georgia?" Enclosed was a newspaper clipping about the appointment of Negro lawyer Christopher C. Mercer, Jr., as deputy prosecuting attorney for Pulaski and Perry Counties. Prosecuting Attorney-elect Richard B. Adkisson, in making the announcement, said that Mercer would be the first Negro deputy prosecuting attorney in history for the two counties and that he probably would be the first Negro deputy prosecutor in the South in modern times. Among other distinctions, Mr. Mercer worked for two years on the staff of the Arkansas Council on Human Relations.

The Tennessee Council continues to have the luck of the Irish (viz. Baxton Bryant) in their staffing. Not long ago the Inter-County Improvement Association, an organization of approximately 200 Negroes with headquarters in Ripley, made an unusual proposal to the TCHR. They asked to become a chapter and offered to put up $3,000 (cash!) if the Council would find another $6,000 and hire a man to work full-time in rural west Tennessee. The Council appealed successfully to the Field Foundation and has hired The Reverend Isaac Richmond, Jr., for the job. Mr. Richmond, 28, is a graduate of Lane College, Jackson, Tennessee, with an A.B. in history and sociology. He also has a Master of Religious Education degree from ITC in Atlanta. He has long been active in civil rights efforts.

The Virginia Council instigated and did most of the administrative work for the Conference on People, Religion and a Changing Virginia which was held at the John Marshall Hotel in Richmond on November 28-29. 1,075 people registered for the conference, which was sponsored by all of the major religious groups of the state. Speakers included Dr. George D. Kelsey, professor of Christian Ethics, Drew University; Dr. John F. Cronin, assistant director, Department of Social Action, National Catholic Welfare Conference; Rabbi Jacob M. Rothschild, Hebrew Benevolent Congregation, Atlanta; Warren H. Turner, vice-president, Protestant Episcopal Executive Council, New York; and Dr. Samuel Proctor, president of the Institute for Services to Education, Washington.

Annual Meetings of the Florida, South Carolina, and Georgia Council

All three of the above councils have had excellent annual meetings recently. I won't try to go into detail about each of the programs, but will risk a generalization based on my subjective impressions from attending the South Carolina and Florida meetings and a reading of the minutes of the Georgia one (which, regrettably, I missed). At all three there were reports from local councils that indicate an increasing amount of involvement and important work on the part of their members. How do you measure interest and enthusiasm, except subjectively? But I came away from the meetings greatly encouraged, with the feeling that there are great many people -- white people and Negroes, poor people and economically comfortable people -- who are willing (yearning, even to work together on the problems of community where they live. If that is so, it bodes well for the state councils on human relations, for, as far as I am concerned, that's what they are all about.

And a Bit of Humor

I guess I got a kick out of this story because of the way Yankee liberals have been hanging back on civil rights lately. (This is aslightly adapted version.)

The figures presented herein were accumulated during the summer and late summer of 1966. While they do not represent the final registration figures for the November elections, the difference is not expected to be large. The figures were compiled from a variety of sources---public and private, official and unofficial.

For four states---Arkansas, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia---complete or near-complete county-by-county figures showing white and Negro registration were not available. For these four states, statewide estimates have been made, based on the best information obtainable.

For two states---Florida and Mississippi---figures did not indicate the race of a sizeable number of registrants. These have been divided between the white and Negro columns on the basis of VEP estimates.

New Executive Assistant at SRC

James N. Wood of Mobile has been employed by the SRC as Executive Assistant to the Director. Jim was born in Richmond some time ago. He was graduated from Fluvanna County High School and then enlisted in the Air Force. He served overseas in World War II as a fighter pilot and was discharged as a captain in 1945. He received his B.A. degree in psychology from the University of Virginia in 1950. Since 1952 he has worked in Mobile in the grain merchandising and ocean freight forwarding business, which involved work with small, country grain elevators over an area including northwest Florida, southern Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, western Tennessee, southeast Missouri, and northern Louisiana.

Jim has served as director of the Mobile Area Committee for Training and Development, which operated a rural training program for approximately 100 migrant farm workers under Title III B of the Economic Opportunity Act and is currently operating an experimental and demonstration project for 280 trainees, with a budget of about two million dollars.

Together with Mrs. Wood (Kathie), Jim has long been active in the affairs of the Mobile and Alabama Councils on Human Relations.

He will take up his duties at the SRC office in late January.

School Desegregation Boon

Human relations folks should be mindful of the beneficial effects of a recent decision and decree by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals on school desegregation. All school systems under court-ordered plans in the fifth circuit are now required to desegregate under approximately the same rules set forth in Office of Education guidelines for Title VI compliance. This simplifies the task of those working for school desegregation. The NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund is reopening all fifth circuit cases. The fifth circuit covers Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and parts of Texas and Florida.

Southern Interagency Conference

The Southern Interagency Conference held its first meeting of 1967 at the Atlanta Biltmore Hotel on January 18-19. Most of the meeting was given to presentation and discussion of A "Freedom Budget" for All Americans, a program for the eradication of poverty recently proposed by the A. Philip Randelph Institute. Bayard

Rustin, Executive Director of the Randolph Institute made an overall presentation. Vivian Henderson, economist and president of Clark College, spoke on the "Freedom Budget" as it pertains to full employment and its proposal of a minimum annual income. Frank Smith, ex-congressman from Mississippi and now a T.V.A. Commissioner, talked about the Budget's proposals for regional development and conservation of natural resources. (SRC is the "secretariat" for the Southern Interagency Conference, a loose organization of some forty intergroup relations agencies for exchange of information and ideas.)

Tennessee Council on Human Relations

The TCHR Annual Meeting has been scheduled for January 28 and 29 at the Andrew Jackson Hotel in Nashville. Outgoing president Martha Ragland will address a luncheon meeting on Saturday. John Dyer, former director of the Office of Economic Opportunity for Tennessee, will speak that afternoon on utilization of available federal programs. Dr. Leslie Dunbar, director of the Field Foundation, will be speaker for the annual banquet on Saturday evening.

The Georgia Council on Human Relations

The Georgia Council has employed a new assistant to the director. The Reverend Al Henry will begin his work with the council in February. Al will come to Atlanta from Koinonia Community Farm of Americus, Georgia. Trained as a Southern Baptist minister, Al served the Pilgrim Congregational Church, Birmingham during the days of Bull Conner and the demonstrations. He was active in the Alabama Council there. The bulk of his efforts with the Georgia Council will be devoted to development of neighborhood councils in the Atlanta area. Al is married and the father of four children.

I have previously mentioned the booklet titled Know Your Rights which was published cooperatively by the Georgia Council and the American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia, utilizing an initiating grant from SRC. It has been a phenomenal success. Designed primarily to help poor people who have trouble dealing with the police, it uses drawings and basic-vocabulary text to clarify the rights of persons stopped or arrested. More than 30,000 copies have been printed and distributed. (The South Carolina Council is distributing the booklet with its own imprint--an arrangement available to other groups, also.) Somewhat to everyone's surprise, it got a favorable reception from police departments. Mrs. Florence Robin of the Georgia ACLU attributes this fact to its emphasis on the policeman's rights, as well as the rights of citizens. Atlanta police Chief Herbert T. Jenkins ordered 1,000 copies and instructed all officers to read it. Police departments in towns like Augusta, Gainesville, and Alma are using it, too. ACLU and the human relations council are holding a number of clinics around the state to explain citizens' rights, using the booklet and slides.

The Georgia Council has also expanded its program of education on welfare rights and will press school desegregation efforts again this year. Although many of us are disappointed with the weakness of "freedom of choice" desegregation plans, the GCHR feels that it is important to continue efforts to secure transfers during this year, lest momentum be lost and Negro parents be even more discouraged. In a series of five area meetings throughout the state the desegregation "rules" will be explained and community leaders instructed in the techniques of organizing for desegregation.

The Houston Council on Human Relations

The Houston Council has a new Executive Director. He is The Reverend Jack Murray, a Lutheran minister. Mr. Murray, who is originally from New Haven, Connecticut, has long been an active member of the Houston Council. He is an Air Force veteran and a graduate of Bethany Lutheran College and the Lutheran School of Theology at Rock Island, Illinois. He has been pastor of Augustana Lutheran Church in Houston since 1960. He has served on the faculty of Houston's Institute on Desegregation for School Teachers, Administrators and Counselors.

The Houston Council has developed an interesting program called "Meet the Mayor." It consists of a series of public meetings at regular intervals at which the Mayor speaks for about 20 minutes on some aspect of the city's administration or problems and then opens the meeting for questions. The Mayor brings along a secretary to help record complaints. The complaints are referred to appropriate departments of the administration and so far have been acted upon with approximately 60% completions, according to Frances Dukler, Acting Director of the Houston Council. Average attendance at the meetings has been 300. The project was initiated last summer when tensions were high. "We cannot take credit for a summer of tranquility because of these programs," writes Frances. "However, we will take credit that 1500 people sat down and talked with the Mayor about common problems, and this was a first for all of us."

The Arkansas Council on Human Relations

The Annual Meeting of the Arkansas Council was held at the Albert Pike Hotel in Little Rock on Saturday, January 14. Keynote speaker at the dinner meeting was Stephen N. Shulman, chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Paul Anthony, Executive Director of the Southern Regional Council, was a luncheon speaker.

The Arkansas Council has come out with a mimeographed Handbook for Local Councils on Human Relations, another of the commendable steps they are taking to organize and service local chapters. Incorporating materials previously prepared by the Florida and Houston councils, it includes specific suggestions of things to do in the areas of (1) education and public schools, (2) voter education, (3) labor and employment, (4) welfare and poverty programs, and (5) housing. Addresses of appropriate resource-agencies for each program area are given. There is also a sample constitution for a local council on human relations. The handbook is well done and seems to me to be a good idea for any of the state councils.

Among other things, the Arkansas Council is working extensively and effectively on prison reform and is in the process of forming chapters in El Dorado, Camden, and Arkadelphia. They have also been given a small special grant by SRC to conduct a study of welfare programs in three counties in eastern Arkansas.

The South Carolina Council on Human Relations

In her quarterly report, Alice Spearman says:

"In the main, most decision-making in South Carolina is done quietly and behind-the-scenes, presumably by a relatively small group of people. To say how much this is because of accepted power patterns, lack of faith in democratic processes, or actual fear of the uneducated, uninformed masses would merely be to hazard a guess. Much evidence points to the need for building a widely representative, informed, and socially motivated citizens' movement. Granted such a process would be slow and require adequate resources and skill, we believe that this should become the articulated, long-range goal of the South Carolina Council on Human Relations."

The SCCHR has made a commendable start in that direction. A year ago they had 957 dues-paid members living in 80 South Carolina communities, and there were eight organized chapters. Now there are 1,178 members from 153 communities and 12 active local councils. In addition there are ten affiliated Rural Advancement Project groups and eight student human relations groups.

A Couple of Movies

For church groups...Aubrey Brown of the Virginia Council, who headed the planning committee for the "Conference on People, Religion and a Changing Virginia," says that a movie shown at the conference seems to have made a great impression on those who saw it. Titled A Time for Burning, it was produced by the Lutheran Church and tells the story of a minister who tried to lead his congregation to come to grips with prejudice and discrimination.

In the end he is pressured into resigning, and the film portrays all of rationalization by some and growth by others in the process. It may be obtained at $20.00 per showing from Contemporary Films, 267 West 25th Street, New York 1, New York.

On conditions in the rural south...Francis Walter of the Selma Inter-religious Project highly recommends Lay My Burden Down, a 16 MM documentary film of social and political conditions among rural Negroes in the vicinity of Selma, Alabama. One hour in length, it illustrates how little recent laws have changed the lot of Negroes in Alabama, what Selma is like now, and the circumstances which drive rural Negroes into city ghettoes. The film may be ordered from National Educational Film Service Audio-Visual Center, c/o Mr. James Cole, Indiana University, Bloomington, Indiana.

Department of Humans Related

A story in the Charlotte Observer about South Carolina Council director Alice Spearman, written by reporter Jack Bass, was headlined "SOUTH CAROLINIAN DOESN'T PUSSY-FOOT ABOUT LIFE" (in huge type). Because the wirte-up was so fascinating and because it says something about, as well as to, the kind of folks involved in human relations in the South, I want to quote the first few paragraphs here--and hope that I don't get into trouble for plagiarizing.

"For almost three years as a young woman, Alice Buck Norwood traveled the world, living on skimpy savings, $500 from her father, and by her wits.

"She spent six weeks in Russia with a student group in 1930 and later found herself branded a Communist as a result.

"To save money, she slept on the floor of train stations in India--with hundreds of the native poor.

"Through it all, the South Carolina banker's daughter developed a sense of compassion, a rejection of race as a measure of individual worth, and a desire "to teach people to raise hell and do something."

"As Executive Director of the S. C. Council of Human Relations, she took over a sickly organization in 1954 with 78 members and has given it her own drive and vitality.

"She has been Mrs. Eugene Spearman for almost 30 years, a smartly-tailored--but not overly stylish--animated aristocrat committed to democracy.

FROM: SRC URBAN PLANNING PROJECT

SUBJECT: CITIZENS AIDS

In the 15 months of the UPP assessment of Urban Planning in the South, we have concluded that the greatest need in obtaining effective and good Urban Planning would be more positive citizen participation. To assist in this we have prepared 5 pamphlets.

| | DATE | PRICE | |
| 1. NEIGHBORHOOD STABILATION | | | |
| Guidelines for groups trying to build stable interracial neighborhoods. How do you recreate neighborhoods that can overcome the forces of segregation? That keep the profits of increased property values in the hands of the owners, instead of in the hands of real estate speculators? --Your action must be biracially oriented. | 1966 | .30 | .20 |
| 2. A HOME OF OUR OWN | | | |
| What families should know when buying their first home. How to shop? What to watch out for? --Get this into the hands of families considering making this big investment. They need your help! | 1966 | .60 | .40 |
| 3. MR. MAYOR - SLUM GHETTOES IN YOUR CITY, Can We Solve Our Housing Dilemma? | | | |
| A guideline for city officials in facing the total problems of slums. What should your city government be doing to provide good housing for all its citizens? --Your job is to get your mayor and councilmen to read it and then press them into action. | 1966 | .50 | .40 |

4. NEIGHBORHOODS - WHERE HUMAN RIGHTS BEGIN

| Experiences and evaluation of three interracial neighborhoods. Three cities where people acted: stabilized their communities and built a sense of civic pride. How to create stable, interracial good places to live? --Your participation based on what others have done should make for more constructive action. | 1967 | .50 | .40 |

5. A GUIDE TO PROGRAMS FOR BETTER HOMES AND NEIGHBORHOODS

| A layman's guide to government and private housing programs. Tells you the programs you are dealing with and how they operate. What public and private resources are available to provide good housing, equally available to all citizens? --Get with it! Being knowledgable is essential! | 1967 | 1.00 | .75 |

We hope that you will find these publications helpful to your program. We would appreciate your keeping us posted on your efforts in these areas of concern and on any results, positive or negative. And we would be grateful for any suggestions for improvement of or additions to these program aids.

Attached hereto are a complimentary group of pamphlets which we have gotten out with the purpose of clarifying Housing and Urban Planning to lay individuals. It is hoped that this will stimulate more effective citizenship participation in urban affairs.

We particularly would appreciate your thoughts, criticism and suggestions on A GUIDE TO PROGRAMS FOR BETTER HOMES AND NEIGHBORHOODS (government and private housing programs). This is a first draft of this manual and your valued advice would be constructive in the redraft before printing. Thanking you for your help, I am,

Dear Friend:

We have just received approval for increased salaries for our positions of Compliance Director and Community Service Director and I write to ask if you know of anyone who might be interested in applying. Both these positions as head of our staff divisions are now open as indicated in the enclosed job description.

We especially need persons with experience in some other agency. We have one of the better state laws covering employment and public accommodations. Our annual budget exceeds $200,000 and in other ways we have good support from State government.

If you know of possible applicants, please encourage them to write or call me personally and to send a resume or application. If you would send the names, addresses and phone numbers of qualified persons, we can contact them to see if they are interested.

Sincerely,

Galen

SUBJECT: OEO's Comprehensive Neighborhood Health Services Program

Enclosed are the Guidelines and the proposal preparation instructions for the OEO's Comprehensive Health Services Program. Human relations councils are in a position to know the needs for this program and the conditions in specific areas; therefore, we hope you will familiarize yourself with this program and urge the appropriate agency(ies) to apply.

Of particular significance is the introduction in the guidelines booklet. In this section, it is stated that in too many instances, health services are: based on outmoded concepts, stripped of good therapeutic relationships, fragmented, inaccessible in terms of time and place, offered in dismal climates, confusing in their eligibility standards and not conducive to effective use. In light of this, a role which human relations councils might play would be that of documenting these conditions in specific areas.

As we gain more knowledge of this program we will relate it to you and we urge you to keep us informed of any problems and/or progress in your area.

Subject: COMPREHENSIVE NEIGHBORHOOD HEALTH SERVICES PROGRAM

AS YOU KNOW TUFT UNIVERSITY WILL OPERATE A HEALTH CENTER TO SERVE 10,000 PERSONS IN A SOUTHERN RURAL AREA. IN AN EFFORT TO UNCOVER MORE DETAILS, I CALLED OEO REGIONAL IN ATLANTA AND MADE AN EFFORT TO CALL TUFTS UNIVERSITY, BOTH OF THESE PROVED UNREALIBLE OR UNINFORMED. IT WAS NOT UNTIL I CALLED A FRIEND AT OEO WASHINGTON, THAT I DISCOVERED SOMETHING. THE CENTER WILL BE IN BOLIVAR COUNTY, MISSISSIPPI. ADDITIONAL INFORMATION CAN BE OBTAINED FROM MRS. RUTH HANFT(202/382-2247) ON MONDAY.

IT SHOULD BE ADDED THAT ALTHOUGH OEO REGIONAL COULD OFFER NO ASSISTANCE, THEY HAVE BEEN VERY ANXIOUS TO HELP. A MAN NAMED JIM SPARKS(526-4322) CALLED ME AND OFFERED HIS SERVICES AND SEEMED ANXIOUS TO HELP IN ANYWAY.

FIELD ACTIVITIES NEWSLETTER

July 20, 1967

About the Hungry Children

Much has happened since this time last month, when the plight of starving people in the Black Belt was mentioned in the newsletter. SRC's "Special Report" by six doctors was issued on June 23. It received wide coverage by the news media; some papers sent reporters into Mississippi and other parts of the South to verify the report. The Department of Agriculture cut from $2.00 to $.50 the minimum cost of food stamps in Mississippi and issued a flurry of defensive news releases, giving figures to show percentage increases in the number of participants in their food distribution programs over the past ten years. Predictable denials have come from the Mississippi press--including one editorial comment about the reported diet of cornbread and molasses, some beans, and little else: "of course... that is what they like."

The testimony of the six doctors before the Senate Subcommittee on Employment, Manpower, and Poverty on July 11 was one of the more promising developments. Dr. Raymond Wheeler, Chairman of SRC's Executive Committee, testified that the situation was "not only a medical emergency, but a national disaster." Senators Stennis and Eastland of Mississippi were there and, picking Dr. Wheeler as spokesman for the group, tried to discredit him and the other doctors. All of this the television networks reported. But they missed, for the most part, the moving statement Dr. Wheeler made toward the end of the day, a statement he had hastily hand-written. He spoke of how he had "watched the southern black man and white man walk their separate ways distrusting each other, separated by false and ridiculous barriers--doomed to a way of life tragically less than they desire...." And he added, in part:

> And through all of that dreadful pageant of ignorance and suspicion and mutual distrust, the most distressing figure of all has been the southern political leader who has exploited all of our human weaknesses for his own personal and selfish gain--refusing to grant us the > dignity and the capability of responding to noble and courageous leadership--when all of us had nothing to lose but the misery and desolation which surrounds our lives.

Houston Councils Sends Caravan to Belzoni

According to Jack Murray, their Executive Director, the Houston Council on Human Relations will send a caravan of fifty automobiles to Belzoni, Mississippi, on Saturday, July 22, in response to the furor about the children's condition. Each auto will be loaded with foodstuffs, clothing, and vitamins. The council is appealing to food wholesalers and drug wholesalers for supplies, and they are taking cash donations from individuals to by vitamins. Murray says that, in addition to whatever temporary relief the supplies might give, the Houston Council looks upon the caravan as a way of dramatizing the issue and keeping it before the nation. He suggests that other councils and allied organizations might want to do something similar on successive weekends.

Sick, Hungry Children in Florida, Too

It seems to me that some of those caravans might well be sent to other parts of the South. To tell the truth, we are a little afraid that people will get the idea that its "only" Mississippi. It's not. For instance Augie VandenBosche, Executive Director of the Florida Council, has testified to the Rural Development Subcommittee of the House Committee on Agriculture that the annual wage of a migrant farm worker in Florida is between $698 and $1,379, according to the Department of Agriculture. (It averages $1,055, according to the Social Security records.) VandenBosche continued:

> Farm workers continue to exhibit high rates of disease and sickness incomprehensible in modern 20th Century America. For example, in one of Florida's smallest counties 100% of all migrant children between the ages of 0 and 15 years have parasitic diseases, 43% of these also have skin diseases and 96% of them under 5 years suffer from diarrhea.

New State Council Personnel

The Alabama Council has employed William Henry Harrison of Yantley, Alabama, As Associate Director. Mr. Harrison attended the public schools of Choctaw County, Alabama, and earned his B.S. degree at Alabama State College. He has done graduate study at Alabama A. & M. College. A school teacher for thirteen years (social studies), he has a lengthy record of activity in community affairs and organizations.

The Florida Council has also employed an Associate Director, William H. Miles. Mr. Miles began his work with the FCHR on July 10. A native Floridian, he grew up in Jacksonville and West Palm Beach and attended Florida Normal Memorial College in St. Augustine. He has been a policeman in Miami, a recreation director with Miami's welfare department, and house parent in a Dade County juvenile home. He too has a long history of involvement in civil rights and human relations organizations and programs.

Random Notes from Quarterly Reports

...The Arkansas Council has two new chapters--in Wynne and Forrest City--and is hard at work on one in Camden.

...Three local affiliates of the Tennessee Council are concentrating on housing problems. The Nashville chapter is setting up a clearing house for persons wishing to buy, sell or rent on a non-discriminatory basis. The Memphis Council is just getting to work on residential housing integration. The Chattanooga chapter has a reservation for 100 units of 221d3 rent-supplement housing and is in the process of site selection.

...The East Alabama chapter of the Alabama Council has recently formed a credit union, with membership in the ACHR as the required "common bond," and has received its credit union charter. This is an interesting idea which enables some council members who are fortunate enough to have a small "nest egg" to put it to better use than just drawing any old kind of interest--and at the same time provides a much needed service to folks who otherwise might get into the clutches of loan sharks....The Huntsville chapter, for about the third year in a row, has had house-to-house visitation to get "freedom of choice" school transfers. About 60 people helped do the work, and they got 673 requests for transfers!

...The Mississippi Council has begun its summer program in the Jackson State College area. The Executive Director, Ken Dean, has been doing a survey on the Medicare program in Mississippi and has helped with another on discrimination in public parks and swimming pools. He has also been introducing poor people to a lot of reporters. A statewide meeting on poverty is planned for August 5.

...On June 18, the Chatham chapter of the Georgia Council sponsored a "Community Service of Prayer for Racial Harmony." There was a special worship service, and the Mayor proclaimed the 18th a day of prayer. The response of the community was generally positive. (For copies of the "Order of Worship," including unison prayers and litanies used, write the Georgia Council, 52 Fairlie Street, Atlanta.)

...The Louisiana Council has a new, growing, and active local affiliate at Franklin. The LCHR, a newly-staffed state council, has over 400 members now.

...The Houston Council has placed 20 VISTA volunteers throughout the city. Mr. William Ainley, a Peace Corps veteran (Uganda) and graduate student at Rice University, has been employed as VISTA supervisor....Some time ago the Houston Council purchased the motion picture film, "A Time for Burning." It continues to be widely shown and discussed throughout the state of Texas. (It was even shown once in Mississippi.)

Worried About Extremist Organizations?

Through the National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials we heard about a new organization called "Institute for American Democracy." It aims to help make democracy work by keeping a watchful eye on extremists of both right and left. The IAD has published a pamphlet, How to Combat Air Pollution, which explains how to make use of FCC's Fairness Doctrine when legitimate groups or organizations are attacked by extremists. "This," quote the NAIRO newsletter, "may be of special interest to intergroup relations agencies in the South and rural areas." So, if you are getting a lot of "nut" programs over your radio, you might want to order this pamphlet. ($1.00 per copy. I.A.D., 1330 Massachusetts Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C. 20005.)

Sort of interesting to me was the IAD's run-down on extremist groups of the left and the right in a recent newsletter. The right-wing groups are far more numerous, far larger, and far, far richer. For example, the largest left-wing group in the U.S. is the Communist Party, USA,--according to the IAD--and their membership is about 12,000 and estimated income $148,000. The largest right-wing group is the John Birch Society with a membership of about 80,000 and an estimated 1965 income of $4,089,000. The "20th Century Reformation Hour" (Carl McIntire's program) has 625 radio outlets and an income of $3,040,000, according to IAD.

"Police Rudeness"

The Atlanta Constitution's Dick Hebert ought to get some sort of award for his editorial in the July 13 editions. After the Dixie Hills riots, during which he had observed Atlanta's police at work, Hebert wrote that though he was often with police at such scenes, he had never seen proof of outright brutality. "What I have seen is more subtle, harder to fight in court," he said. He went on to suggest the term police rudeness, pointing out that "rudeness," according to the dictionary includes "the desire to wound."

He had heard policemen call a Negro "boy." He had seen a policeman refuse to step aside to let a Negro pass. He had seen Negroes shouldered aside needlessly. No court would call these "brutality," he suggested, but enough of such rudeness can have the same effect as brutality.

Atlanta knows it must meet the slum tragedy head-on if it is to silence the angry. It must provide opportunity for jobs, housing, education. More immediately it must see to it that those with authority in their hands recognize that Negroes are due their rights, including the same personal dignity all men seek, and that Negroes, too, are innocent until proven guilty.

Dear Mr. Roberts:

Mrs Hurst has passed on your note of July 21 to her and I am hastening to enclose some basic documents about the Tufts-Delta Health Center. This does not include very much in the way of current or operating detail but I will try to get more information to you very shortly. It now looks as if we will be open and in full operation by about October 15; the Health Center itself is now under construction and most of the necessary professional staff has been recruited. Things are moving so fast in Mississippi-and with the various political forces arrayed against us-that it is difficult to be definitive, but perhaps the enclosed material will serve at least as a beginning. If there are any urgent needs for information, or any special points about which you need further information for a particular purpose, please do not hesitate to call me. My phone number in Boston is 542-5600 ext. 638; in Mississippi it is Mound Bayou 85 (area code 601)

Sincerely yours,

H. Jack Geiger

P.S. One of our urgent needs is to locate at least a few Southern Negro Registered Nurses, with public health experience and familiarity with or experience in rural conditions of the kind encountered in the Delta. In the entire state of Mississippi, there are no Negro nurses to our knowledge with public health training or experience! The program is a good one, adequate housing will be provided in Mound Bayou, or salary ranges for experience public health nurses would be between six and nine thousand dollars a year, and if the SRC has any resources that might help in this particular area of recruitment, I would be extremely grateful. More later, and thanks again.

Federal Aid Said To Abet Segregation

WASHINGTON (UPI) — A spokesman for the American Friends Service Committee charged today the widely praised federal Elementary and Secondary Education Act is preserving segregation in the South.

M. Hayes Mizell, director of the committee's South Carolina Community Relations Program, said ESEA funds are shoring up floundering Negro schools and encouraging Negro parents to keep their children in segregated schools.

"We are concerned that ESEA is indirectly contributing to the preservation of the dual segregated school system in many areas of the South," he told the Senate Education Subcommittee.

Mizell said ESEA funds are creating the impression among Negroes that education in Negro schools has significantly improved. This gives comfort to those who say it is the duty of the Negro community to stay with the Negro school and make it better, he said.

Mizell also charged that U. S. Education Commissioner Harold Howe has been unsuccessful in seeing that ESEA funds remain available to Negro children when they transfer to previously all white schools.

He said parents of children who benefit from ESEA funds for poor children have no voice in how the funds are used. This causes the funds to be used to teach Negroes skills traditionally associated with minority groups, Mizell said.

He said the result often was great misunderstanding and even hostility between the Negro community and school authorities.

Mizell also charged that the federal government has failed to properly enforce school desegregation guidelines.

He cited Dorchester County School District One in South Carolina as an example.

Mizell said he had worked with Negroes there last year and 140 children had shifted to white schools.

During the school year there were numerous instances of physical harassment and "complaint after complaint" was filed with the federal government, he said.

The government took no action and as a result there will be only 61 Negro children in desegregated schools there this year, Mizell said.

He attacked freedom of choice desegregation plans operating in the South.

Such plans "leave it to powerless Negro children to take the initiative to abolish the dual school system which they did not create," he said.

"Freedom of choice isn't worth a damn," Mizell quoted one South Carolina Negro as saying.

Mr. Mizell For The State

It is the considered judgment of Hayes Mizell that South Carolina's freedom-of-choice system for making school assignments is a dud. Mr. Mizell, it may be recalled, heads the South Carolina chapter of the American Friends Service Committee. And the American Friends Service Committee, it may be recalled, is known more for its promotion of forced integration than for its efforts in behalf of freedom. Mr. Mizell's verdict is scarcely surprising.

The fact of the matter is, of course, that compulsory segregation in the classrooms is dead, and that the number of Negro children in previously all-white Southern schools increases significantly each fall. Year before last, the percentage of Negroes attending integrated classrooms in the 11 Southern states was a bare 7.5. Last year this figure more than doubled — it rose to 16.9—and this September it certainly will increase again.

Mr. Mizell is unimpressed, as he explained this week to Sen. Wayne Morse's subcommittee on education. The subcommittee is in the process of weighing the effectiveness of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, and Mr. Mizell was there to file his customary brief in behalf of state and federal compulsion.

The trouble with the Education Act, he explained to the senators, is that it has helped poorer Negro schools. Many of these schools now provide training available nowhere else in the community. Is this any way to promote integration? Negro students who enjoy special advantages where they are can hardly be expected to appreciate, as Mr. Mizell does, the overriding importance of sitting next to a white child. Presumably these Negroes go to school to learn and not to foster the New Society that Mr. Mizell seems so anxious to promote.

If Mr. Mizell were alone in his delusions they would make no difference. But he is not. Among his powerful allies he can count a host of government officials, including the U.S. Commissioner of Education and more than one eminence of the federal bench. It is the belief of all these deluded brethren that integration, to be worth having, must be compulsory. It is the method, more than the result, that counts; and they would gladly substitute their greater understanding for the free choice of parents and children alike.

No doubt they are sincere in believing that this way lies the New Jerusalem. It is quite beside the point. Their error is as dangerous as it would be if they were conscious of what they are promoting. For what they are promoting is a compulsory society, as opposed to a free society. New arrivals will receive no kinder reception for having traveled to the destination on someone's good intentions.

This is not to say that Mr. Mizell and those who share his philosophy will bring about the republic's immediate collapse. Rome was not built in a day; neither did it fall in a day; and neither shall we. Nevertheless, those who would sacrifice the judgment and free choice of the individual for the allegedly superior wisdom of the state are furthering the process of deterioration. Mr. Mizell is among this company, and those of us who live within earshot of his counsel should keep the fact in mind.

About the Riots

All hell has broken loose since our last newsletter, and it would seem awkward to begin this one without taking note of the riots. We can hope that it is about all over for this season, except for the analyzing--some of which turns out to be almost as agonizing as the riots themselves. In fact, on the assumption that nearly everything that can be said has been said, what I would like to do is comment on a couple of the commentaries.

One was an observation by Mr. Herbert Bienstock of the Bureau of Labor Statistics in connection with a report of the Bureau on unemployment and under-employment in the slums of the nation's cities. "The South sowed the wind," he said, "and the northern and western cities of greatest Negro population are reaping the whirlwind of never-ending joblessness and despair." He was thinking, of course of the "wind" of inadequate education and training, the lack of opportunity and therefore of motivation with which the South has burdened its Negro citizens before they migrated to those cities. On the other hand, a recently-published study of the Watts riot of 1965 found that a preponderance of the rioters and looters were not recent arrivals, but people who had been in Los Angeles for a long time--and had found the nation's promises fulfilled no better there than in the South. So let's face it: it is a national problem, and no city or region has "escaped" the riots, least of all the South.

Then, I find illuminating the insight of Frederick J. Hacker, a white University of Southern California psychiatrist. "What must be understood by the rest of America," he said, "is that, for the lower class Negro, riots are not criminal, but a legitimate weapon in a morally justified civil war." In other words, what appears to us insiders to be criminal irresponsibility appears to some Negro slum dwellers (I wish Hacker and a lot of others would learn to speak of "some Negroes" instead of "the Negro") as a highly responsible and moral rebellion against an immoral and irresponsible and chronically oppressive society.

Finally, there was the finding, not surprising, of both the Louis Harris and Gallup polls that white Americans are growing less sympathetic and more prejudiced. "The whites concern about the black man has been quickened," reported NEWSWEEK, "but it seems vitally lacking in affection. Fear and resentment have apparently displaced their weight in sympathy, and the white man's endorsement of massive aid to the ghettos may seem to him an imperative more pragmatic than moral."

> In a list of standard indexes of white prejudice toward non-whites, nearly every familiar stereotype of the Negro finds greater acceptance by white majorities than it did last year. Thus, 70 percent of the whites agree that 'Negroes have less ambition than white people,' against 65 percent who thought this way in 1966; 47 percent agree, 'Negroes keep untidy homes,' against 39 percent a year ago, and 58 percent accept a flat statement that 'Negroes have looser morals,' compared with 50 percent last year. The trend was the same on assertions that Negroes 'laugh a lot,' 'have less native intelligence,' 'want to live off the hand-out.'

What all of this means to me is that if, as I keep arguing, the special task of private human relations agencies like ours is enlightenment of the white majority, our job has been made bigger and more difficult even while the time available for doing it has been foreshortened.

The "Urban Coalition"

That impression was further strengthened by a sidelight on the Emergency Convocation of The Urban Coalition, held in Washington on August 24. The Urban Coalition is made up of prominent municipal officials, captains of industry, and civil rights leaders. The Emergency Convocation brought together 1000 such leaders to further the Coalition's goals, which are: (1) an emergency work program to provide job training and employment for the urban poor, (2) a major expansion of the private sector's efforts to train and provide jobs for the hard-core unemployed; (3) a long-range program for the physical and social reconstruction of American cities. The Coalition's steering committee includes men like Mayor Lindsay of New York, Mayor Allen of Atlanta, Henry Ford II, George Meany, I. W. Abel, civil rights leaders Roy Wilkins and Whitney Young, and John Wheeler, president of the Southern Regional Council. Co-chairmen are Andrew Heiskell of General Electric and A. Philip Randolph.

After adopting a very fine statement in which these people and hundreds similar to them committed themselves to the goals mentioned, a delegation went up Capitol Hill to talk to congressional and administration leaders about it. They were graciously received by the Speaker of the House, who listed the administration's present legislative goals and asked for their support. But, according to published reports, the response of both Capitol Hill and the White House was notably lacking in a sense of urgency or imagination; the Emergency Convocation galaxy was just another meeting.

Which means that, if anyone around still thinks there is no need for private initiative and voluntary associations like human relations councils now that we have all of those civil rights laws,--he has another think coming!

South Carolina Council Chooses New Director

Mrs. Alice Spearman, Executive Director of the South Carolina Council on Human Relations, is retiring. She has been Director of the SSCHR since it was first formed, and it goes without saying that the Council and all of us who have worked with her are deeply indebted for the person she has been and the work she has done for so long.

Her successor, beginning September 1, will be The Reverend Paul W. Matthias, who comes to South Carolina from his pastorate in the Cashiers Methodist Church, Cashiers, North Carolina. Paul is twenty-nine years old, married, and the father of three small boys. He received his B.A. from Duke University in 1960 and his S.T.B. degree from Wesley Theological Seminary in Washington, D. C.

The Department of Good Ideas

While the council presidents were meeting in July, Dr. Stewart Wilber of the Houston Council on Human Relations suggested that the SRC promote gift subscriptions to NEW SOUTH. Commenting about the high quality of the magazine in its quarterly format, he said this would provide human relations council members with a way of putting the most thoughtful literature on the subject in the hands of friends who maybe have not seen the light--or at least haven't become accustomed to it. It would also be a good project for local councils to give annual subscriptions to public libraries, school libraries, church libraries, etc.

We rather liked that idea. Accordingly, there is a gift-subscription form with each copy of the Summer issue of NEW SOUTH, which is just off the press. In addition to all four 1968 issues, your gift-recipients will get a copy of the Fall, 1967 issue along with a gift subscription certificate in your name. Thus, you give five issues for the price of four ($3.00).

This is an opportunity to take the easy way out on your gift list for Christmas, Hannukkah, or birthdays without feeling guilty! It's for a good cause.

People who do not have a gift-subscription form may just send their lists of names, addresses and ZIP numbers along with a check in the appropriate amount. They should include themselves on the list, of course, since, if they don't have a subscription blank--they aren't getting NEW SOUTH.

And a "MUST" Book

Pat Watters, SRC's Director of Information, and Reese Cleghorn, Associate Editor of the Atlanta Journal, are the authors of a book to be published November 7, 1967, by Harcourt, Brace and World. The title is CLIMBING JACOB'S LADDER--THE ARRIVAL OF NEGROES IN SOUTHERN POLITICS. Leslie W. Dunbar, former Executive Director of the Southern Regional Council and now Executive Director of the Field Foundation, writes in the Introduction:

> A history of the struggle of Southern Negroes to gain dignity and the ballot in the 1960's, this vivid book brings intimacy and depth to its subject by drawing on the Southern Regional Council's field report files of the two Voter Education Projects. Excerpts from these reports show what it is like to be up against sheriffs, Klansmen, and artfully dodging public officials in hundreds of Black Belt towns; how Civil Rights professionals and idealistic students met the unlettered people of the cotton-field shanties; and how Negro communities, hitherto passive and numb, found the courage to demand the vote.
> There is analysis of the meaning of the new vote...the continuing power of White Supremacists, of the NAACP, SCLC, SNCC, and CORE and their differing senses of necessity, the emergence of "Black Power" and the problems it poses for the traditional alliance between white Liberals and Negro activists.
> CLIMBING JACOB'S LADDER is not just for the South, or for Watts, Chicago, Newark, Harlem, or Detroit, but for all America.

The price will be $8.95. Pre-publication orders may be sent to Harcourt, Brace and World, Inc., 757 Third Avenue, New York, New York 10017.

Dates of the SRC Annual Meeting

Dates of the Annual Meeting of the Southern Regional Council, originally set for November 8, 9, and 10, have been changed to November 1, 2, and 3. There has been some confusion about this, so the change should be noted--especially by state council directors and chairmen, who will be invited guests. As usual, the meeting will be held in Atlanta.

About That Wicked Federal Money

Citizens of Georgia were shocked last week when Governor Lester Maddox, who is normally a bit on the puritanical side, said that he was sorry there appeared to be no legal way to provide state money for private schools and that if the federal government keeps jeopardizing public education in Georgia with all of that school integration business, they should be told to "take their money and...and...ram it."

I just hope he doesn't ram it too far. The Tax Foundation reports that only seventeen states now pay the federal government more money than their own states get in return to finance aid programs. Georgia citizens pay the feds only 72 cents for every dollar they get in return, while folks in New Jersey pay $1.83 and, in New York, $1.40 for each dollar they receive. I should think the Governor would be grateful for such timely succors.

Mississippians pay 45 cents for a federal dollar, by the way, and most of the southern states follow the example. South Carolina pays 81 cents; Louisiana, 51 cents; Kentucky, 57 cents; West Virginia, 46 cents. And so it goes.

And Finally (I hope)

I absolutely promise not to clutter this newsletter with personal notes, which I realize most readers would find boring. However, I do like to conclude these things a little on the light side, and this time the joke is on me. Joyce and I are the proud and deliriously happy parents of twin boys, born Sunday, August 27, and doing nicely, thank you.

Bill Roberts, who is working with us on temporary assignment, is also newly the father of a son, born August 31 (for obvious reasons, I am finishing this thing three days after I started it!). And, Mrs. Carol Lockhart, Secretary to the Field Activities Department is "on deck."

What population explosion?

RE: Joint Meeting of SRC and A. Philip Randolph Institute with Rustin on November 8, 1967

It was agreed to hold the meeting at the Biltmore in Atlanta on February 23, 24 and 25. The initial session would begin at 8:30 p.m. on February 23 with sessions from 9:30 am to 12:00 p.m and 2:00 p.m. to 4:00 p.m. on February 24 and 25. On the night of February 24th there would be a banquet. It is still a question as to whether or not other than participants would be included in the banquet. Also a question as to who would pay.

As to participants, Rustin suggests southern NAACP, SCLC, Urban League, VEP reciprocants, Negro elected officials, including only city and county officials and state legislators, labor, a hopeful area entitled "white political leaders, white southern liberals, key church people and fraternal groups." Paul and I suggested adding, in addition, representatives of the organized poor, some local CAP board members and university individuals, both black and white. The question as to how to approach national civil rights leadership was resolved by a proposal to invite them to the banquet on Saturday night asking each one to make a short presentation.

It was proposed that the meeting devote itself to three general topics: voter education and voter registration, organizing the unorganized and economic programs. Hopefully, we can find 10 individuals knowledgeable in all three areas to serve as resource individuals in Saturday and Sunday morning workshops. It was felt that 10 workshops of approximately 40 people each would be used. And hopefully some scheme could be devised so that these groups could be shuffled for each of the three program meetings.

The opening session would hear two keynote addresses one by a Negro, probably Vivian Henderson, one by a white, possibly Ray Wheelter. The final meeting Sunday afternoon would be a meeting of the entire group. In essence the chief function of this meeting would be to adopt a one page statement. Rustin is to prepare the first draft. We at the SRC are to begin immediately attempting to select the 400 participants. We want to get out as soon as possible an advance notice of the meeting simply requesting people to be aware that an important meeting is to be held on February 23, 24, and 25 to which they will be invited and to please if possible hold these dates. Rustin has accepted the responsibility of writing the actual invitation to the meeting.

We agreed that we would need an absolute minimum of $10,000 to run the meeting and we would need $20,000 to comfortably run the meeting. Rustin, since he is in New York, will begin the preliminary negotiations with several foundations attempting to raise $25,000. Paul will go to New York and accompany Rustin when the actual solicitations are made.

It was felt that the three subjects to be covered particularly voter registration, and organizing the unorganized will have to be described somewhat more diplomatically. Paul will undertake this task.

SOUTHERN RURAL RESEARCH PROJECT

THE NEGRO IN RURAL ALABAMA--
LIVING, FOOD & HEALTH CONDITIONS

During the summer of 1967, the SOUTHERN RURAL RESEARCH PROJECT invited students from all over the U.S. to participate in a massive job of information-gathering in rural Negro areas of Alabama and Mississippi. The students, utilizing a 23-page questionnaire dealing with farm programs and related problems as well as living conditions, interviewed over 1800 Negro heads of households (representing families of over 10,000 persons).

Nine hundred eighty-six (986) of the interviews were conducted by 14 students in 5 representative blackbelt counties of Alabama. The following is a composite of the living conditions, food and health situations revealed by the answers to their questions...and observations of the interviewers.

The Negro farmers interviewed are the invisible people of the South. One million farm Negroes were "lost" by the local white census takers for the 1960 census.* Services, both federal and state, are equally "lost" on their way to the Negro farmers. The result is as follows:

*Equal Opportunity in Farm Programs, U.S. Civil Rights Commission, 1965, p.9, n.20.

LIVING CONDITIONS

The home of the Negro farmer in Alabama is typically an unpainted 3-4 room wood-frame shack for 3-5 adults and 8-12 children.

Sleeping Rooms

The home is all bedrooms except for one room for cooking with no living room or common room. Each bed is used for 2 or 3 adults or up to 5 children--2 to 3 beds to a room. Those who do not own "spring" mattresses will use fertilizer sacks stuffed with raw cotton or rags--frequently infected with lice, ticks, fleas and roaches. In some cases, children must sleep on the floors with little or nothing underneath them nor any covers for warmth or protection against the swarms of insects, particularly mosquitoes.

The lack of space and privacy mean that even conjugal intimacy must take place in the presence of children of all ages, while young students in the family lack the solitude for their studies.

Kitchen

In the kitchen, cooking is done for an average of 9 to 11 people. This part of the house is much like a partitioned porch and is only partially cut off from the outdoors by crude doors and paneless windows or shuttered holes in the wall.

The largest piece of furniture in these kitchens is likely to be the woodburning stove. This stove blackens the interior of the house when used for cooking or, less effectively, for heating. The soot also covers the few clothes which hang on nails or a cord in corners of the other rooms. Where electricity is available, there may also be a refrigerator or deep freeze which is used to store vegetables for winter.

Outdoor pumps are the usual source of water in most areas, but some communities of Negro farmers must share wells or walk 1-2 miles for creek water. Some of these creeks provide foul, stagnant water in which there may be silt and animal droppings. Carrying the days drinking, cooking and washing water is a considerable task for the mothers and children when they cannot trap enough rainwater. The water is placed in a pan for washing dishes; in a big black iron pot for boiling clothes outdoors; in a tub for use with the washboard and in the same tub to stand up in while "sponge bathing."

There is no piped-in water in these homes and never any indoor toilets. Pots are kept inside during the night and bushes are used near the house or wherever the members of the family happen to be. The few outhouses to be found are wooden enclosures containing 2 slats of wood with space between--covering a hole in the earth and usually inconveniently located in fields--often, by circumstances, uphill from the water supply.

What windows there are in the house are very unlikely to have any glass and are "sealed" (as are the holes and gaps in the walls, ceilings and floors) by use of rags and cardboard. Newspapers cover the walls to both seal the house against the elements by cutting down the draft through the walls and to better reflect the light in the soot-darkened home.

Nevertheless, cold air and rain come in through the walls and ceiling of all the rooms of these shacks. Often a large hole in the floorboards is allowed to remain to permit an escape for rainwater coming through the unrepairable wood roof--all of which contributes to the rat problem. To survive in these homes in winter without expending large amounts of wood, the families dress themselves day and night as heavily as their wardrobe allows.

Although the landowner is obligated to make repairs on the homes, he rarely makes any improvements and promises repairs only on condition of higher rents. The expense of the repairs and the insecurity of his tenancy prohibit the farmer from making the costly repairs himself. House rent, when not included in the crop rent, is usually $10-$15 per month.

FOOD

Breakfast

Breakfast, especially during the seasons of heaviest work, is the largest meal of the day. It is eaten before daylight at those times when the farmer and his family have to be in the fields--otherwise it is eaten at an indefinite time before noon and typically consists of:

|---|---|
| Hominy grits | Eggs (up to twice weekly) |
| Biscuits or cornbread | Meat (occasional small portions of chicken or lean pork) |
| Coffee or water | |

Midday Meal

Children going to school are generally unable to pay the daily fee of 25¢ for the school lunch and when peanut butter and jelly sandwiches (occasionally bologna) are not available, they do without the noon meal. The rest of the family will generally skip the midday meal except when engaged in hard work on the farm.

Evening Meal

This final meal consists of vegetables, peas or beans with cornbread or biscuits and maybe leftovers of a hot midday meal--if cooked that day. Most of the year, however, breakfast and the midday meal are spaced far enough apart to avoid the evening meal and the midday meal is eaten late when the children return from school.

The beans and vegetables eaten are those grown in the gardens around the house and are generally okra, collard greens, sweet potatoes and turnips. These are cooked with large quantities of grease and chunks of fat, called "fatback." The fatback is also eaten by itself as a course and is called "whitemeat."

The "filler" in the meal is huge servings of a bread: home cooked biscuits or cornbread and occasionally storebought "lightbread." At times, especially during the winter when the canned vegetables have been used up, bread soaked in syrup becomes a meal in itself.

The drink served with these meals is sometimes coffee, but usually watered down Kool-Aid with little sugar. As an alternative, ice-water is offered. Less than half of the families interviewed drink milk at any time and only a few of these drink it regularly. About 20% of the families own cows that provide milk.

The "meat" meal is usually chicken. Most farm families raise some chickens, but not enough to be able to consume them regularly nor do the hens lay regularly. As a result, chicken and eggs are eaten only about twice a week and come from the farm's resources only part of the time.

Most of the time, the only meat is some pork product, neckbones or just fat. The low cost of these pork products and the ease with which pigs can be raised are the main reasons why pork is eaten over beef. Families possessing pigs or hogs will slaughter as many of them as possible and ration the meat, fat and bones throughout the winter months. Beef is rarely encountered in the rural Negro' diet.

Service of Meals

Cooking the meals on the wood stove is a laborious task. The stoves discourage any complicated cooking and severely limit the range of variations and the number of dishes that can be prepared. When the preparation of a meal is completed, the pots are left simmering on the stove and the family moves to the kitchen and help themselves to the peas, beans, fatback and the cornbread. Since there is rarely enough silverware for the entire family at once, it is used by only a few. There are never enough dishes--those who eat last use the plates of those who have already finished.

There is never enough table space (and chairs) for the whole family to sit down and eat together. This requires eating in "shifts" and eliminates the pleasure of communal dining and conversation.

At the end of the meal, none of the family will feel hungry, and nothing is ever "left over" for snacks. Some may even feel bloated.

When wood becomes especially scarce, cooking is done only every other day or so and portions of the provisions are warmed over. This eliminates the need to buy or haul or purchase wood (at rates up to $4.00 for a 2 day supply). The purchase of wood occurs most often among families that live on or near soybean plantations where all woodland has been stripped away.

HEALTH

From birth to death, the Negro farmer and his family in Alabama are denied the rudiments of health care that is generally considered as essential to survival.

Birth

The Negro baby is delivered in the home by a Negro midwife who, though of considerable experience, is trained to a limited degree. The midwife is of little help in difficult births which in these circumstances can become emergencies endangering the life of mother and child. The midwife's job is also complicated by the fact that the minimal medical attention paid the expectant mother in advance of birth does not warn of unforeseen difficulties such as a breech birth.

The homes in which these birthsoccur provide the most deplorable conditions in which an American child could be born. There is sometimes no electricity and almost never any running water. The water used in the delivery comes from a creek or well or perhaps a yard pump and may be polluted with soil or animal waste, including in some instances,the excrement of the family itself.

Heating is attempted with fireplaces and the wood stoves which must also be relied upon to boil water for the delivery. The stoves require considerable quantities of wood and the soot which pours into the air further complicates all attempts for sterility.

The material used in the handling of the child is not likely to have been washed in water hotter than can be tolerated by the hands. The cleanliness of nothing in the house is guaranteed. The home and its furnishings are infested with swarms of flies, fleas, lice, mosquitoes and ticks.

After birth, the mother may be forced to resume her activities within a few days but always within a few weeks of the delivery with a greater or lesser speed dictated by the economic predicament of the moment or the need for labor in the cotton fields.

During the first critical year of its life, the average baby does not see a doctor although he is taken to the clinic for free shots by the nurse. (The typical family is unaware, and unadvised of, other free or low cost health services at the same clinic.) Much more often than is true for the whites of the same area, the children of the farm Negro are stillborn or are born sickly of a sick mother and die during the first year*

In winter, the wind rushing through the cardboard-filled holes defy the small fireplace and kitchen stove making it impossible to adequately heat the home. It is not unknown for babies to freeze to death at night. Mothers describe the health of the children as being much worse during winter months because of continual exposure to the cold--sometimes below freezing temperatures--when only one room of the home can be warmed and the family groups there.

*According to the 1960 Census figures for Alabama, the infant mortality rate for Negroes was almost double that of whites.

When the poorest of the mothers is incapable of nursing her child, the baby receives no milk at all. These most unfortunate babies are sometimes nursed with water--the cloudy water of the wells and creeks.

Childhood

During the important years of his greatest growth, the farm child's diet is largely confined to hominy grits, chicken or pork bones, fat, certain vegetables, beans, breads and little or no milk. Even those with milk cows have neither the equipment not the knowledge of methods to process surplus milk for the period when the cow "dries up." The surplus is instead fed to the pigs.

Toddlers are wrapped in pieces of cloth or wear old undershirts until their turn for the rags of their elder sisters and brothers. The problem of clothing the children against the weather often keeps them out of school during the coldest part of the year--during the summer, the token garments suffice. In warm weather, shoes are usually worn only by those who work in the fields. The bare feet of the children are open from bruises and from sores which continuously appear on their feet (as well as other parts of their bodies.) It is through such openings in the feet that stomach worms are acquired.

The children under seven commonly have scabs and sores on their heads, arms and legs that remain open and running with puss and blood. These scabs and sores get little medical attention or cleaning and are fed upon by flies and other insects which do not seem to annoy the drowsy children who let the flies climb around their eyes and mouths with no apparent irritation. These sores and infections often spread throughout the family, which only in the rarest cases can afford (or even are aware of) antibiotic treatment.

The youths suffer from swollen stomachs and skimpy hair, while mothers complain of the children's loose teeth and worms or respiratory problems. In one instance, a family sought medical attention for a child of 10 who had lost his fingernails and whose arms and legs were covered with sores and scabs. The condition was diagnosed as probable vitamin deficiency, but the mother, a widow and tenant cotton farmer, was unable to afford further help or medication.

Throughout their childhoods, the children display relatively little interest in each other and play no "make believe" or other games. The children have no toys or dolls. When not working around the house or in the fields, the youths sit idly in the dirt handling sticks or string or remain inside sitting quietly or sleeping. The children always sleep a great deal in school. In spite of this behavior, the mothers who are unfamiliar with noisey, vivacious children, consider the over-all health of their own children to be "as good as it could be" or "normal." These mothers consider what they have described of their children's ills as usual meaningless events in child growth.

While working in the fields, the mother takes her children with her, and keeps them nearby until they are about four years of age and capable of shelling peas and other household tasks. By the time the child is seven, he works full time in the fields--sacrificing much of his education. (White school officials rarely attempt to enforce truancy laws among Negro students.)

Adulthood

A child may reach adulthood without [illegible] ever having been to a doctor unless perhaps he has suffered a serious injury. The dentist is seen for needed extractions--rarely for treatment. During adulthood, the rural Negro begins cycles of dizziness and "falling out." Visits to doctors invariably reveal a need to discontinue starchy and fatty foods such as pork products, especially fatback and cornbread, biscuits, beans, peas and grits--the basic diet. The women especially become bloated from this diet and suffer because of their extreme poverty, and in spite of their great industry, the obesity that proverbially afflicts the rich and slothful.

Year in and year out, the Negro farmer and his wife work 8 to 10 hours a day under summer suns, planting, chopping and picking cotton and vegetables and legumes until muscular and joint injuries curtail their enfeebled efforts at making a subsistance income. Complaints of strokes and partial paralysis are common among farmers of middle age. Victims of severe arthritis, or strokes often do not go to the doctor--they would be unable to follow his directions because of the cost of the medications or of the foods they may be required to eat.

The adult woman, even when pregnant, continues her heavy schedule of work beginning in early morning with cooking, cleaning, hauling water and preparing children for school until midmorning when she must prepare meals for the rest of the family. The remainder of the morning and the entire afternoon is spent in the cultivation of her vegetable gardens and cornfields and in very strenuous work in the cotton fields until she prepares the evening meal, puts her family to bed and closes the day. The pregnant mother quits her labors as late as three weeks before giving birth. During pregnancy, the mother visits the clinic two or three times but receives the only treatment given to pregnant Negro women--the measuring of weight and blood pressure by a nurse--never a doctor.

By the age of 40, the Negro farm wife has given birth to 6 to 9 children who have the choice of following the unpromising and difficult paths of their parents or of leaving their south for a less desireable experiment in one of the urban ghettoes. If the child remains, he can expect to repeat an up-till-now unaltered cycle of poverty.

WILCOX COUNTY, COY, ALABAMA

Description of the B____ Family Home

The B's, a Wilcox County cotton farming family of 10 persons, live in a one room wooden shack, 3 miles off the main paved road of Coy, Alabama. The dirt road leading to the B's home, and shared by 8 other Negro farm families, is in a state of almost total neglect. In a matter of minutes after a brief summer shower, the ruts and holes turn into impassable mud puddles--and remain in that condition for several days following. During an exceptional rainy season (such as this summer) the puddles do not have a chance to dry up at all. Ordinarily, a small car cannot drive up the road above 5 miles per hour. Aside from an occassional shack, the narrow road is lined on either side by expansive cotton fields.

The B's hut squats on a small clearing off the dirt road. The ground in front of the house is sandy--or more often than not--ruddy. The shack itself is an almost square (15'x9') wooden box, with one door and two shuttered windows. The roof is unshingled--the skeleton wood frame covered by a layer of tar paper for protection against the elements. Unlike most Negro farm huts in Wilcox County, the B's house does not have a porch--and thus for socializing and relaxing as well as for escaping the intense heat of the closed in room, the family sits on a large, old--no longer servicable--horse cart in the front yard. A sawed off tree stump serves as door step.

The inside room is dark and cluttered. A lone naked bulb dangles from the ceiling. Two foldaway beds (with three children lying width-wise on each) line the walls. Rag quilts on the floor provide beds for the older children. Dust, dirt, paper, and food scraps are swept into a large hole in the floor, left by a rotting plank. It is the same hole through which the rats crawl into the room at night to gnaw at the fertilizer sacks that serve as bedding and linen for the family. The matresses themselves, despite the attempt to keep up fresh bedding, smell of stale urine. Fleas, flies, and cockroaches vie for room on the beds. Holes in the roof and the walls are tacked up from inside with flattened cardboard boxes--and colored newspaper sheets pasted over the wooden slats--both insulate and decorate the hut. The family does not have an "outhouse" or any other toilet facilities. Water is supplied by a pump in the back yard. The shack is heated in the winter by a single fireplace, and the small wood stove used also for cooking.

Except during the cotton picking season, the B's eat two meals a day--usually grits for breakfast and greens and chicken necks--or sometimes field peas for dinner. The bulk of the family's diet is supplied by the vegetable garden and, especially in the fall, from small wild game occasionally caught in the woods nearby: squirrel, possum, wild turkey, etc. About $5 a week is spent on the other food staples: rice, grits, flour, cornmeal, coffee, sugar, fat back, etc.

Mrs. B. is virtually head of the family and manager of the 40 acre cotton and truck farm (rented)in the absence of her husband. She clears, plants, and harvests the land along with the help of 6 of her 8 children--ranging in age from 2 to 16--and of a tractor that she managed to obtain through loans and outside work. It is still only partially paid for. The work day for Mrs. B., as for most Alabama farmers, begins at sunrise and ends at sunset. The family subsists on a gross annual income of $1,200 from the proceeds of the farm.

There is little money to be had for clothing. Mrs. B. works every day in a worn out, torn YWCA porter's dress that someone gave her. The girls wear old slips, polo shirts and material scraps. The youngest child (age 2) goes naked or else wears just a top. The children all seem under sized and underweight for their ages. When they are not working in the fields, the children spend their time sleeping or sitting out in front of the house doing nothing. The two year old cannot yet balance himself for walking because of the size of his swollen belly, and the thinness of his legs. He does not yet talk and is just beginning to cut his first teeth. The oozing, crusted sores on his head attract both fleas and flies, which he rarely bothers to brush away. Mrs. B. complains of headaches, fainting and weak spells. She thinks she may have high blood pressure, but cannot afford to get to the doctor for medicine for herself or for the children.

PAUL ANTHONY
EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

A Council to attain the ideals and practices of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South

M E M O R A N D U M

January 17, 1968

TO: State Council Executive Directors

FROM: Ed Stanfield

SUBJECT: Our next meeting

Let me suggest that we have our next state council directors' meeting on Friday, February 23, here in Atlanta. This date is suggested because SRC and the A. Philip Randolph Institute are co-sponsoring a meeting, to start that evening and run through Sunday noon, to which you will be invited. By flying in on the night of February 22, we could gather early on the 23rd and have our business completed before the conference starts.

Please let me know if there are objections to that date, or if you will not be able to attend our meeting on that date. If there are strong objections, I will let you know; otherwise, consider it a firm date.

The conference which is to run through that weekend will attempt to bring together a broadly representative group of southerners to assess the situation in the South and, hopefully, agree on some common goals and steps. I understand that there will be particular emphasis on voter registration and education, organizations and the un-organized, and economic progress. (You will get a fuller explanation a little later.) If there are persons you particularly would have invited to such a conference, please send their names and addresses. Be sure to list them in order of priority.

PAUL ANTHONY
EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

A Council to attain the ideals and practices of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South

FIELD ACTIVITIES NEWSLETTER

February 7, 1968

State Council Notes

For some reason January and February get more than their share of annual meetings of the state councils on human relations. Arkansas, Tennessee, and Virginia had theirs on the same day, January 27. I could attend only one. Maybe they plotted it that way.

At the Arkansas Council's meeting Will Campbell of the Committee of Southern Churchmen spoke in his own inimitable way to 153 people at a banquet. August VandenBosche, Executive Director of the Florida Council, spoke at a luncheon meeting.

Father Walter Clancy was honored as retiring president, after three terms of very notable leadership of the Arkansas Council. The new president is Rabbi Elijah Palnick of Temple B'nai Israel, Little Rock.

The Tennessee Council met at Hotel Patten in Chattanooga. Featured speaker was Dr. Charles Hamilton, Professor of Political Science at Roosevelt University. Dr. Hamilton, a noted interpreter of the Black Power movement, spoke on "Racial Isolation: The Conflict Between Group Goals and Priorities."

Mr. Lewis Sinclair was elected to succeed Dr. William G. Pollard as president of the Tennessee Council. The council adopted a budget of $68,500 for 1968.

Baxton Bryant, Executive Director, reported a 50% increase in membership, which now stands at more than 1,800. He also reported formation of the West Tennessee Self-Help Development Corporation as an outgrowth of TCHR efforts in West Tennessee. With a board made up of citizens of five rural counties (Tipton, Lauderdale, Fayette, Haywood, and Hardeman) the Corporation has enjoyed excellent cooperation from the State Employment Commission, Welfare Commission, and Farm Home Administration, as well as from officials of federal agencies.

Bryant also announced plans to employ four part-time assistants, one in each of the four largest cities of Tennessee -- Knoxville, Chattanooga, Nashville, and Memphis. These persons will work with the local chapters and with chapters in surrounding areas. It is envisioned that this may lead to full time professional staffing for each of these urban-rural areas.

Finally, Bryant told about his "Wide Area Telephone Service," recently installed in his Nashville office with an extension to his home. Most people know, by now, what a WATS line is. But, just in case you don't it enables the subscriber to call anywhere in the state (or specified area) for a flat monthly rate. So Baxton can call anybody in Tennessee anytime of the day or night and talk for as long as he likes without worrying about running up a bigger telephone bill. I'll bet he does, too.

The Virginia Council, at their meeting in Richmond, launched a major program, called "Project Homeward Bound," aimed at assisting veterans of the armed services to find equal employment opportunities and fair housing opportunities. The program will be coordinated with "Project Transition" of the Department of Defense. Alfred B. Fitt, Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower, was a major speaker at the meeting.

Carl E. Auvil, President of VCHR, says some 15,000 veterans will return to Virginia in 1968 alone. "White and Negro Virginians have come to know one another in wartime as they seldom have in our largely segregated way of life. Many will be satisfied with nothing less than equal opportunity upon return to civilian life."

Simultaneously VCHR is launching a statewide funding campaign. Armistead Boothe is Chairman of the Campaign Committee. The goal is $50,000.

The Virginia Council has already begun a book service, according to Frank Adams, Executive Director. It offers members savings of 20% on any hardback book and 10% on paperbacks. Plans are also underway to offer a prescription eyeglass service which will provide doctor ordered specs for $15.00 ($18.00 for bifocals). A discount drug distribution service is also planned.

The VCHR Board has approved a plan to reorganize the council. Basic units will be small groups of no more than ten people, instead of city-wide chapters. These small groups are designed to (1) enable people to relate to each other as persons and in-depth, and (2) enable them to act for justice and an open society according to their felt needs and interests. Thus there might be, in the same city, one group devoting its attention to fair housing. Another group or two might concentrate on voter registration and citizenship education. Another might put out a community newspaper. Another might monitor the school board and city council meetings.

Whew! I figure we are about to find out what happens when an irresistible force (Frank Adams) meets an immovable object (The Commonwealth of Virginia).

The Alabama Council met at the Stafford Hotel in Tuscaloosa on February 3. The Honorable Brooks Hays, former congressman from Arkansas, was the principal speaker. (It was a moving speech. The remark I recall most fondly was, "The patriot and the dissenter can inhabit the same heart.") Joseph Gannon of Huntsville was elected to succeed Dr. C. G. Gomillion as president.

Staff reports included accounts of the formation of the Greene-Hale Sewing Center by Rural Advancement Project Director Lewis Black; intensive work with the newly organized Southwest Alabama Farmers Cooperative Association; efforts for the second consecutive year to help Negroes in Macon County participate in Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service elections; and surveys of Alabama's blind and deaf schools, mental health hospitals, industrial schools, and other institutions, resulting in some measure of desegregation.

The North Carolina Council has elected Moses C. Burt, Jr., its new President. Mr. Burt is an attorney and was legal counsel for the North Carolina Fund. He is a resident of Durham.

Much of the NCCHR's energies have been devoted to fair housing efforts in Greensboro and the "Research Triangle," which includes Raleigh, Durham, and Chapel Hill. The Council co-sponsored the Seventh Annual Housing and Urban Renewal Conference in Durham in late November. The staff carried much of the burden in preparing for that conference, and Will C. Allred, Executive Director, prepared and presented a position paper.

The Mississippi Council's staff has devoted months of attention and effort to the problem of hunger in Mississippi. Kenneth Dean, Executive Director, and Glennis Barnes, Associate Director, have assisted all of the various groups doing reports and offering aid of one kind or another. Rather recently MCHR published in tabloid form an illustrated reprint of the three principle reports--that of the SRC, one by the Surgeon General, and a third by the staff of Mississippi's governor. The MCHR collection is titled, "The Truth About Mississippi's Hungry Children."

Increasingly, the Mississippi Council is serving as a clearinghouse for relief efforts. I picked up a copy of Look last week and saw, in the letters to the editor column, a notation that readers desiring to donate for relief could send contributions through the Mississippi Council. Also, plans are under way to set up the "Family Project," by which northern families will be asked to assist impoverished families in Mississippi.

Randolph Institute-SRC Conference

The A. Philip Randolph Institute and the Southern Regional Council will sponsor jointly a conference at the Sheraton-Biltmore Hotel in Atlanta, February 23-25. A conference "call" has gone out to more than 400 persons, black and white, in the South.

"We believe that the South has a unique and powerful contribution to make to the solution of the agonizing problems of this nation," says the call. The South has "confronted the issue in its starkest form," it continues, and "...because of this...the South understands, as no other section of the country does, that it must make a fundamental, ethical choice." After pointing out that the South has yet a little time to avoid the errors which were committed in northern cities, the call concludes, "Therefore, we summon Southerners, both black and white, to the duty, the opportunity and the challenge to participate in a common effort, laying aside past racial antagonisms, to construct a just social order for all people."

For Local Councils

The Chatham County Council on Human Relations (Savannah, Georgia) has come up with an idea that might be borrowed, with appropriate adaptations, by others. They have prepared a 30 minute film-slide presentation titled "In the Heart of Old Savannah." It turns out to be a graphic commentary on slum conditions. Members of the council present it to civic groups, schools, -- anywhere they get a chance.

The Exit Line

I've run my 7½ watt mind over the world situation, the national situation, the regional situation, the Georgia situation, the Atlanta situation, and my own personal situation -- and I can't think of anything really funny. The nearest I can come is to picture for you Charles Morgan, Jr., ACLU regional man, as the only member of a projected panel to show up at a meeting of the Southern Interagency Conference. The subject was "Racial Separatism," so Chuck proceeded to role-play both sides of th issue. The trouble was that he was equally convincing on either side. One came away with a notion something like "Armed rebellion is inevitable, but it cannot possibly succeed, so things are bound to get worse." It was a funny kind of panel, but nobody laughed much.

February 20, 1968

One of the great delights of my youth, as I grew up in Atlanta in the country's first public housing project, was the joy of visiting my relatives in the country during the summer. The roadside shanty in West Georgia where my aunt lived was to me a resort, a villa---despite the outdoor toilet, the well water and the cracks in the wall, the ceiling and the floor. There was no place like rural Georgia in the summers of my youth. For in the fresh country air my cousins, my brother and I and the little white boys from the big white house played in the red dirt, kept an eye on the rabbit boxes, and ate heartily my aunt's hot self-rising biscuits and sorghum syrup.

I remember riding there in the "colored" section of the train and waiting to be met in the "colored" section of the tiny, rural railroad station. I remember drinking from the "colored" water tap and going to the back window of the cafe at the county seat on Saturday. These indignities never really bothered me because they were no different from the indignities in Atlanta. I knew that my cousin worked for three dollars a week and two quarts of buttermilk. I knew that in payment for working seven days a week at the big house, my aunt didn't have to pay rent on her shanty. And I thought that telling Mr. Sam's wife at the store to put the candy and drinks I wanted "on the books" was a pretty good deal. I never knew until years later that my aunt could never completely clear the debt and was always owing at the end of the year and at cotton-picking time.

The one thing that I got really mad about, and never accepted, was my aunt's instruction in the summer of 1947 to call Bobby, one of the white boys at the big house, "Mr. Bobby, now, because Mr. Bobby is twelve years old." I was twelve that year too, but nobody called me "Mr. Vernon." But not even this could keep me from eagerly looking forward to my summers in the country.

But then, after a few summers came a letter written by my aunt to my mother. My aunt explained that she didn't want to stay on Mr. Sam's place any longer. The family owed Mr. Sam great sums of money and was getting deeper in debt with each year and each crop. Cotton and farming wasn't what it used to be. Mr. Sam was looking for work in the county seat for himself, and food was short. My aunt and her family wanted to leave the country and come to the city, but they were afraid to ask Mr. Sam for permission to leave. As it turned out, my brothers and I drove to West Georgia at midnight and sneaked them out under cover of darkness to bring them to the city.

So they came to the city for a better life---for what had to be a better life. But they came uneducated, more than a little frightened, and ill-equipped to deal with the complexities of city life. This is not an uncommon story. It can be told by thousands and thousands of Negroes all over America. My aunt and her family and thousands like them brought something besides their battered luggage to the city. They brought an abiding distrust of white people and their way of manipulating the accounts, a bitterness about the white man's callous manner of dealing with them, and deep scars left by the experience of being driven from the land. Such experiences are not soon forgotten. Their misfortunes and their bitterness are being passed along to generations who don't know what a rabbit box or an outhouse or a cotton crop or a country store look like.

So my aunt and the other black people of America moved to the city. They are still moving. Some are coming to the cities because of drive and ambition and the search for a better quality of life. Many are being pushed off the land by new farm techniques and, sometimes, by spiteful landowners. With their movement, black people are reshaping the nation's cities and the nation's politics.

But when my aunt and others have left the land and the small towns and the tightly run citadels of resistance and degradation and have fled to the cities, what do they find? They find, to a certain extent, more freedom and, perhaps, fewer overt insults and less constant oppression. In some respects, however, life in the cities is as bad and in many respects it is worse.

Life in American cities is becoming increasingly crowded and chaotic. As an article in the Los Angeles Times recently put it, our cities are "unplanned and unmanageable, unsafe and unhealthy, overcrowded and underfinanced." But to the urban poor---and particularly the black poor---these are abstractions. In the daily press, we read about the problems of air pollution, congested freeways, and overloaded airports. We read about water pollution, inadequate tax base, and the need for rapid transit systems. As real and pressing as these problems are, the problems facing the poor are even more real and pressing---hunger, disease, filth, unemployment, inhumane police, crowded schools, and inadequate housing. For many of the poor, in short, the problem is survival.

Urban Negroes are increasingly finding that an effective weapon for meeting this problem is political participation and the vote. Sometimes the realization comes slowly, but I believe that it now is coming at a rapid accelerating rate.

The Negro vote in the North emerged as an important political force in the presidential election of 1944. It was in this year that the new Negro votes in Northern cities made the presidency especially responsive to the interests and demands of Negroes.

In the South, meanwhile, Negroes were just getting the right to vote, and that plays an important part in our story.

Just after World War II, only a half-million Negroes were registered to vote in the 11 states of the Old Confederacy. Today the figure is more than three million, or 60 per cent of the Negro voting age population.

These new Negro votes in the South, like Negro votes in the Northern cities, are making themselves felt in national elections. A post-election study by the Southern Regional Council in 1964 showed that the Negro vote made the difference in the presidential outcome in five Southern states. As it turned out, Mr. Johnson was not exactly in desperate need of more electoral votes. Nevertheless, the demonstration of Negro voting strength in the South was there for all to see. In the five Southern states carried by Sen. Goldwater, Negro registration was either below or barely equal to the average for the region. In other words, as might have been expected, the senator carried those states in which Negro registration was the lowest.

The greatest gains in Negro registration in the last several years have come in these states covered by the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Under the Act, Negro registration in Alabama has more than doubled. There also have been significant gains in Louisiana, Georgia, South Carolina and Virginia. But nowhere has the leap forward been as dramatic as that in Mississippi. From a pitifully low Negro registration figure of eight per cent, Mississippi Negroes have jumped in just two and a half years to a registration figure of nearly 60 per cent.

I am sure I will surprise you when I tell you that Mississippi no longer is at the bottom of the ladder in Negro registration and that this dubious distinction now belongs to North Carolina with a Negro registration just over 50 per cent. There are more than 30 counties in North Carolina covered by the Voting Rights Act, but thus far the Justice Department has not seen fit to send in federal examiners.

I mentioned presidential races, but I could cite dozens of elections in which the Southern Negro vote has been decisive in the last several years.

For the first time since Reconstruction, Negroes serve in legislatures in six of the 11 Southern states. There is a total now of 23 Negro legislators in the South.

But this barely scratches the surface in describing the extent to which Negroes are gaining political office and political strength in the South. There are nearly 250 elected Negro officials in the South today, and the number is growing steadily. The list of elected officials includes 22 Negroes in Mississippi of whose victories you probably read in November. And just the other day, an additional 35 were elected in Louisiana.

The first big push by Negro voters in the South came in urban areas. It was in the cities that Negroes could register to vote without being put off the land or getting a not-so-friendly visit from the sheriff. To the extent that any Negroes could pay the poll taxes and meet the literacy tests and overcome the other discriminatory barriers erected by Southern registration laws, it was, by and large, urban Negroes. Hence there is hardly a major city in the South today in which Negroes do not constitute an important political force. Often, the Negro vote can be decisive. As whites move out and Negroes move in, Negro voting strength becomes stronger.

To be sure, sometimes there is difficulty persuading the urban Negro in the South to go to the polls. But this is not always the case. Very often it depends on who is running and what the issues are. Just recently the conservative Richmond News Leader complained that whereas only 63 per cent of the white registration in that city voted last November, 73 per cent of the Negro registration voted. A bit reluctantly, no doubt, The News Leader concluded that "the administration of local affairs rightfully belongs to those who go to the polls come election time."

But as important as the urban Negro vote is, even more stirring developments are taking place in the oft-forgotten rural areas of the South. It is in these areas that the civil rights struggle is most fierce and most hazardous. It is in these areas that the road to political participation is most difficult and most dangerous. Only one of the 23 Negro legislators in the South comes from a rural area. Nevertheless, many seemingly minor but locally significant offices are being won in rural areas.

West Feliciana Parish in Louisiana provides as good an illustration as any I know of. A little over four years ago, not a single Negro was registered in this small parish, although well over half the parish population is Negro. Now more than 2,000 Negroes are registered in this parish, thanks to three things---civil rights activity, the Voting Rights Act and grants from the Voter Education Project. And last November, six Negroes were elected to parish offices in West Feliciana Parish. This is a picture which is gradually beginning to emerge from some of the rural areas in the South where some of the worst racist oppression has taken place. In a few minutes, I plan to tell you what meaning this rural activity has for the cities, North as well as South.

Thus far, I have attempted to identify two important new forces in the politics of urban America: the Negro voter and the Negro officeholder. Of course, we have had some elements of each of these forces for many years. But now we have both in large numbers, and each constitutes a major urban political force.

There is a third new force which ought to be mentioned. It is the community, or indigenous, organization. I have in mind particularly those neighborhood organizations set up under the anti-poverty program. Others are being organized, publicly or privately, to deal with some special neighborhood need related to ghetto life.

Very rapidly, these community organizations have learned that their demands, no matter how legitimate, generally must be backed with political muscle. They are learning that political participation is a route to justice and the realization of their aspirations. Thus these community organizations quite frequently have political awareness as a major emphasis.

Mayors, county bosses and backward-looking politicians are not unaware of this fact. This explains a great deal of the political opposition to the poverty program. It explains Congress' desire to tack on the Green Amendment and other crippling restrictions designed to check the poverty program's thrust in the direction of political participation on the part of the nation's poor.

Hence, the survival of this new force in the urban political process depends to a degree on how well the poverty program survives. At this point, one would have to say that outlook is unencouraging---perhaps even bleak.

I could mention reapportionment as another new urban political force. Indeed it was reapportionment that made possible the election of 11 Negroes to the Georgia Legislature. And reapportionment is making legislatures, previously almost totally rural in outlook, at least slightly more responsive to the needs of cities. But reapportionment also has made possible the election of suburban conservatives and reactionaries as well as urban progressives. As a result of reapportionment 20 new members of Congress were elected from suburbs of big cities in 1966. Only five of these new members voted against the drastic curtailment of funds for the Model Cities program. So this force, if we define it as one, moves simultaneously in differing and offsetting directions.

Having identified the new forces of urban political power, the question next becomes what are the problems inherent in making these forces effective. More specifically, how can these forces be made vehicles for meeting the needs of the urban poor and, particularly, the Negro poor?

If these are truly forces to be reckoned with, then there is bound to be conflict over who will lead them. Such conflict rages continually among urban Negroes today. Just a decade or so ago---and I speak especially of Southern cities, which I know best---a handful of Negroes made all the decisions for the black people of the community. Generally, these were in the city's better educated and more successful Negroes. In a word, they were middle-class. In almost every city today, these ruling cliques no longer make all the decisions. In city after city, their power has diminished drastically in the space of a few years. No longer are they the sole consultants for city hall.

The first direct challenge of the old leaders came from the student protesters in the sit-in movement. Nowadays the challenges come from the community organizations I mentioned earlier. These "grassroots" organizations are demanding a share in the decision-making and a place in neogtiations with city hall and the city's white power groups, such as chambers of commerce.

These conflicts over leadership do not lend themselves to unanimity among urban Negroes. But neither do the times nor the issues. No longer, usually, is the issue simply black vs. white. And objectives are not as easily defined as they were when the target was desegregation of lunch counters and public accommodations. Today the city-wide Negro leadership may be pushing for jobs, housing and better education. But the indigenous organizations may be more interested in paved streets, playgrounds, street lights and better police protection.

An unending battle rages between Negro conservatives and more militant leaders whom we might describe as Young Turks. But even the latter are having to prove their intention and their capacity to lead to the more radical and less rational Black Power advocates. City hall and the chamber of commerce only make the situation more difficult with their seemingly irresistible temptation to brand one leadership group or the other as being "responsible." Black Power groups cannot be excluded from the leadership. There is a tremendous emotional response among Negroes to their position. So black leaders today must be responsive to a wide range of opinion within the black community. The role is not an easy one to fill.

Another problem confronting the new forces of urban politics is alignment or non-alignment with some of the old urban forces. In some parts of the country, urban Negro voters have allied themselves with upper middle-class and power structure whites to elect moderate but cautious white officials. There are strong signs that the burgeoning Negro vote is ready to reject these alliances, which always were undependable anyway.

No longer will Negro voters be willing to align themselves with those who seek Negro support in the election of a mayor and congressman and then instruct those mayors and congressmen to vote against Negro positions on such issues as open housing and the location of public housing units. In short, the alliance with wealthy whites---which has existed in some Southern cities---has proved too much a one-way street to suit the growing Negro vote.

Neither can labor be counted upon as a regular ally. Negroes are looking with increasing suspicion at the discriminatory practices of many unions. They are looking with increasing suspicion, too, at paper coalitions formed with labor leadership a few weeks before the labor fellowship goes out to vote for the racist candidate. There is a growing awareness among Negro leaders that this sort of thing happens more often than it should.

Lest you think that I overstate the case against labor, let me tell you about a meeting at which I spoke just a few days ago. This was a regional meeting of up-and-coming young prospective labor leaders from Southern states. At this meeting a presidential poll was taken. The results revealed that the front-runner was not Johnson, not McCarthy, not Nixon, and not Romney. It was, instead, none other than the de facto governor of Alabama, George Wallace. When I spoke, I found out that the poll accurately reflected the sentiments of these young white union men, and I am quite sure that the prejudices run just as deep, if not deeper, among the rank-and-file in the locals back home. Urban Negro voters have more than ample reason to be wary in their dealings with labor.

On the other hand, it is clear that Negroes cannot in most cases win by "going it alone." Alliances and coalitions are undoubtedly necessary. Yet they cannot be as tenuous, uncertain and unrewarding as in the past.

Still another problem confronting the new forces of urban politics is the problems these forces have with each other. I speak now about the relations between Negro officeholders and Negro voters.

Every officeholder must try to remain on good terms with his constituency. But for Negro officeholders today, this basic political task is doubly difficult. There is a strong feeling among some American Negroes today that the entire "system" is corrupt, and that this means each and every officeholder, whether black or white. Often the Negro officeholder becomes a favorite target of abuse from the very people who elected him. Whether fairly or unfairly, his constituents expect him to deliver tangible benefits. If he does not deliver, and pretty fast and often, he is assumed to be a "sell-out."

Even the Negro candidate for Congress in southwest Mississippi, Charles Evers, is viewed with suspicion by some Mississippi Negroes. When candidate Evers went to predominantly Negro Tougaloo College a few days ago, he encountered hostile questions. It seems that Mr. Evers was accused of being something of an Uncle Tom because he chose to run for Congress. He was reprimanded for saying that he would strive to represent all the people of the district.

From the standpoint of the Negro voter, it must be said that some of the suspicion about Negro officeholders is understandable. There have been enough Negro officeholders who have been guilty of Uncle Tomism to make Negro voters wary of them all. Very often the Negro officeholder walks a booby-trapped path, with enemies of both colors waiting in ambush on all sides. Usually he must sit at the table with white officeholders of equal and higher ranks. But the very act of sitting down at the table seems to cost him support among some Negro voters. We may find more and more Negro officeholders going out of their way to get criticized by white politicians. There is nothing like an attack by white interests to repair one's fences among Negro voters.

The Negro officeholder must have some victories in the councils of government to carry back to his constituents. He must produce legislative and policy concessions that go to the heart of ghetto problems, or his days in office are numbered. Such victories also are needed as antidotes to the frustration and disillusionment that lead to urban violence.

Another problem facing the new forces in urban politics is the movement toward metropolitan government and city-county merger. There is a great hue and cry today for consolidation of local government units to provide a broader and more effective base for meeting our multiplying urban problems. This also is a means of recapturing for the city well-to-do whites who have moved to the suburbs for a variety of reasons---among them the desire to escape taxes, responsibility and Negroes. There is much to be said for the trend toward consolidation in local government.

At the same time, this trend poses a threat to the new forces of urban political power that we have been talking about. Generally, the result is a dilution of Negro voting strength. Sometimes it sounds almost like a form of gerrymandering designed to prevent the rise of Negroes in local politics. There is a joke now to the effect that Atlanta will extend its borders to Macon, 90 miles away, if it will prevent the election of a Negro mayor. Three Southern cities ---Miami, Nashville and Jacksonville---have forms of metropolitan government. I must confess some misgivings about this approach if it means blunting the forces for change and reform.

Likewise, Negroes should be on guard against another "good government" device often pushed in the cities, and that is citywide or areawide elections as opposed to district elections. District election is a major reason why Georgia alone has nearly half of the Negro legislators now serving in the South. Areawide and at-large elections usually mean fewer Negroes at the tables of government.

The community groups and indigenous organizations that I talked about are groping to maximize their effectiveness and to bring needed programs to their community.

Yet, they are relatively inexperienced in government and public affairs, especially in the South, and there is much they need to know. They need to know how to best relate their new political strength to bread-and-butter issues. The tremendous enthusiasm of the new indigenous groups must be matched with technical political skills and know-how, information and research, and an understanding of the nature and functions of government. These groups need an investment of resources and people to help them help themselves.

The leaders of the indigenous groups today are those who yesterday were inspired by the bands of youth in the South who preached to them the gospel of political participation. Having inspired them, and having led them thus far in the political process, the idealistic students of the early sixties have largely abandoned their unlettered but courageous friends of the cotton fields and the slums at a time when they are most needed. Indeed the greatest hope for the masses of Negroes rests with the young, educated, new Negro middle-class. They are needed as community organizers, proposal writers, lawyers, doctors, welfare specialists and the like.

I said earlier that Negro political success in the South, whether in rural areas or urban areas, influences the solution of urban problems, including those of Northern cities. This is so because rurally oriented Southern conservatives are the quickest to vote against any congressional proposal that has to do with the plight of the cities. Moreover, these Couthern conservatives command key congressional committees that can kill or cripple legislation designed to help the cities. In the past these Southern conservatives have relied on white voting blocs to retain office. The future of these Southern conservatives is decided periodically in dusty crossroads towns that Manhattan never heard of. Thet is why, if I make myself clear, 260,000 Negro voters in Mississippi can have a lot to say about what happens in Harlem, Watts and Hough.

I began this talk by telling how my aunt moved from a rural county to the city. Despite the disappointments and rigors of urban life, she, like most Negro Americans, has not lost faith in America, nor hope for solving the nation's racial problems. She is among those Negro Americans referred to in two recent polls of Negro opinion. The polls reveal the Negro's abiding faith in himself and his country.

The question, however, is whether or not her children and grandchildren will inherit and hold on to her faith and her hope. I say this because their faith and hope are shattered almost daily, as must have been the case in Orangeburg, the children and grandchildren of those who came to the city for a better quality of life remember that they could not bowl in the local alley because they are black. Some are proclaiming that if they could not bowl at the bowling alley, they cannot go to Vietnam. They hear the mayor saying that Orangeburg's race relations are as good as any city's in the nation. They see the governor telling the nation that Black Power was the cause of it all. And they witness Henry Smith, a fellow student, shot, dragged off campus, slugged with billy clubs, struck by a gun butt, dying by gasping, "You can hit me, but you can't hurt me no more."

So black youths in the ghetto are asking, "Keep WHAT faith, baby?"

The democratic political process can restore that faith and renew that hope. Whether it will or not remains to be seen.

Dear Dr. Witherspoon:

Herewith is a copy of the draft statement of aims for the proposed "Southwest Council of La Raza." Except that it is proposed as a Mexican-American organization, rather than a multi-ethnic agency, it seems to be similar in purpose and function to the sort of council we have been discussing.

At any rate, I thought you would like to see what is being proposed. As you know, I will be going to Denver to meet with them on Saturday, February 10, and will of course give you a report.

I have talked to Reese Cleghorn to tell him that he will receive an invitation to be a workshop leader at the Austin conference and to urge him to accept. I believe he will. So far I have not reached Al Kehrer, who is out of town.

Best wishes,

MIRROR TO AMERICA?

Second Supplement to Special Report of March 22, 1968

April 28, 1968
Price .20 each

"So we are going to Washington on the urgent business of reform before it is too late. We must have a de-escalation of the war in Vietnam and a massive escalation of the war against poverty and racism. We must guarantee that in this richest society in history, the poor, too, can find comfort and security and decent jobs and respect. It is time to re-order our national priorities. All those who now speak of goodwill and who praise the work of such groups as the President's Commission now have the gravest responsibility to stand up and act for the social changes that are necessary to conquer racism in America. If we as a society fail, I fear that we will learn very shortly that racism is a sickness unto death."

I N T R O D U C T I O N

In a special report issued March 22, 1968, and a supplement dated April 3, the Southern Regional Council described in detail the strike of sanitation workers in Memphis which began February 12. These reports explained that the strike had quickly become a struggle for assertion of manhood and dignity, supported overwhelmingly by the Negro community of Memphis, seeking an end to the paternalistic variety of racism which prevailed in white Memphis.

The first report warned of "tragedy waiting in the wings." Its supplement said that tragedy had come in an outbreak of violence (window breaking and a small amount of looting and arson by Negroes, clubbing and shooting by police) during and after a march led by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., on March 28. That incident resulted in the death of a sixteen-year-old Negro male by police gunfire and in injuries to sixty people, mostly Negroes. The supplementary report ended with this statement: "It is not the nonviolent movement that is on trial in Memphis, but -- once more -- American democracy. Not the leadership of some Negro ministers is threatened, but the nation itself."

It is a sad duty to offer now, in a different era inexorably begun, a continuation of our report of the confrontation in the microcosm that is Memphis -- and of its appalling denouement.

D A R K  F O R E B O D I N G

After the march was destroyed on the 28th, top staff leaders of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference flew into Memphis and began intensive preparations for a new attempt at a march on Friday, April 5. At the suggestion of Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and Victor Gotbaum of the New York Council of the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, AFL-CIO, the date of the march was postponed to Monday. The two men promised a rally of labor and civil rights forces from across the nation.

Meanwhile, Federal District Court Judge Bailey Brown, at the request of city officials, had issued on Wednesday, April 3, a temporary restraining order which prohibited Dr. King and his aides and "all nonresidents acting in concert" with them from "organizing or engaging" in the massive parade. Dr. King promptly labeled the order a "basic denial of First Amendment privileges" and said that he planned to ignore it, if attorneys could not get it lifted.

That night Dr. King, addressing the 2,000 people who came to Mason Temple in the rain, was in a somber, reflective mood. He said:

> Well, I don't know what will happen now. We've got some difficult days ahead. But it really doesn't matter with me now. Because I've been to the mountaintop. I won't mind.

> Like anybody, I would like to live a long life. Longevity has its place. But I'm not concerned about that now. I just want to do God's Will.
> And He's allowed me to go up to the mountain. And I've looked over, and I've seen the promised land.
> I many not get there with you, but I want you to know tonight that we as a people will get to the promised land.
> So I'm happy tonight. I'm not worried about anything. I'm not fearing any man. Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord.

Baxton Bryant, Executive Director of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations, said shortly after the meeting ended that the civil rights leader "sounded as though he were giving his own eulogy." Others concurred.

That premonition was all too accurate, as the world now knows. It was the last speech of Dr. Martin Luther King. Twenty-one hours later, an assassin -- believed to be white -- shot Dr. King to death as he stood on the balcony of his hotel room.

SORROW, ANGER -- AND MORE FRUSTRATION

In the early hours of Friday morning, following the assassination, Baxton Bryant called for the resignation of Mayor Henry Loeb:

> We saw President Johnson this week place the interest of the country above his own self-interest and pride. Peace seems to be a little closer in Vietnam as a result.

> Mayor Loeb has nothing but trouble and turmoil ahead governing a city whose population is 40 per cent Negro. He is a man of principal but doesn't have the capacity or the background to understand or interpret the rising expectations and demand for decency in the black community.
> For the peace, justice, and tranquility of the entire community, and safety and peace for himself and his family, he should resign as mayor of Memphis.

The call for the mayor's resignation was taken up by the Memphis Central Labor Council, AFL-CIO.

It was Mayor Loeb's insistence that the strike was illegal, together with his avowal that he would "never" sign a contract with the union or agree to deduction of union dues from the men's paychecks, that had prolonged the strike and led to the invitation to Dr. King to come to Memphis. But Loeb was reflecting the sentiments of the majority of his constituency.

Later on that morning, nearly 150 ministers, about 30 of them Negroes, held a memorial service at St. Mary's Episcopal Cathedral, then walked silently seven blocks to the city hall for a confrontation with the mayor. The decision to take that walk had actually been made on Wednesday, April 3, the day before the murder. The inner-city ministers were in the majority and were for it, but suburban ministers were nervous about such action and the group was persuaded to postpone it on the rationale that there should be a carefully prepared statement. Now, on Friday, there was no delay. After hearing and adopting a prepared statement, the group proceeded, spontaneously, to the mayor's office. They were accompanied by three police cruisers. Four officers in each car wore white helmets and some carried shotguns. They passed elements of the National Guard in battle gear stationed before public buildings and stores.

Mayor Loeb was waiting for them in his office. Their resolution was headed by a quotation of Jeremiah 8:13: "They have healed the wound of my people lightly, saying, 'Peace, peace,' when there is no peace."

> We, as ministers of God . . . mourn with deep sorrow and a sense of unspeakable loss the murder of our brother, Dr. Martin Luther King, eminent preacher of peace, advocate of the power of nonviolent love, promoter and practitioner of true manhood.
> We who are white confess our implication in this tragic event by our failure to speak and act, clearly and specifically, with conviction and courage, to the attitudes of prejudice and patterns of injustice which produced the society in which this act could occur . . .
> . . . The grave crisis which is upon us is caused primarily . . . by lack of private and public will to put into action, at whatever costs, the professions we have so long and so easily made with our lips -- to do unto others as we would have them do unto us and to love our neighbors as ourselves.
> . . . Let us together . . . work creatively and selflessly for a new community, in > which equality and justice for all prevail and in which no man suffers the loss of his human rights because of racial prejudice or arrogant paternalism.

> . . . We implore our mayor and city council to address themselves with swift dispatch to the forging of a mutually acceptable solution including agreement upon union recognition and dues check-off . . . .

The statement was concluded with a quotation from the New Testament: "And when He (Jesus) drew near and saw the city he wept over it, saying, 'Would that even today you knew the things that make for peace.'" (Luke 19:41-42a)

After the reading, Rabbi James A. Wax, head of the predominantly white Memphis Ministers' Association, made an impassioned statement to the mayor. He spoke in a loud voice and did not conceal his wrath. "We come here with a great deal of sadness and . . . a great deal of anger," he said. He told Mayor Loeb that what had happened was the result of oppression, injustice, and inhumanity and that they were appealing to him for leadership. He adjured the mayor to stop hiding behind legal technicalities and obey "laws greater than the laws of Memphis and Tennessee . . . the laws of God."

The mayor responded, according to the New York Times, "Each of us is sincere. I know your sincerity and I hope you know mine. Although we disagree on some points, each of us is trying to do what we think is right . . . I thank you for coming up."

Clearly he thought the interview ended. But Dr. Ralph Jackson, converted conservative Negro minister, whose fiery preaching had moved and delighted Negroes throughout the struggle, now showed a different side of his personality in a tearful, sorrowing plea to the mayor. "We plead with you. We beg you, do not send us away from here again without an affirmation," he cried. He urged the mayor to blame the ministers, if necessary, but by all means to modify his rigid stance. But the mayor's position remained unchanged.

His next visitors were nine Negro teachers. They had just come from the airport where Dr. King's staff had enplaned for return to Atlanta with his body. They complained that they had been kept from "our dear Dr. King's body" by National Guardsmen with bayonets. They also rebuked Mayor Loeb for neither going to the airport nor sending a representive of the city.

OTHER REACTION IN MEMPHIS

On Friday morning, the Memphis Commercial Appeal offered a reward of $25,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the murderer or murderers. The Scripps-Howard chain offered another $25,000. On Friday afternoon, the Memphis City Council underwrote another $50,000, the bulk of which, councilmen were told, would be raised by subscription of Memphis businesses.

An anonymous would-be benefactor offered to give the union $25,000 to pay union dues for all of the sanitation workers for six months, so that there could be a cooling-off period. This was rejected with some vehemence by the union, and labor leaders explained that the prospective donor did not understand the situation: what was at issue was not money but the dignity of collective bargaining by these laboring men.

That person, whoever he was, was not the only one with good intentions who missed a point. The two daily newspapers, whose news and editorial policies were high on the list of grievances of the Negro community, predictably pleaded for calm and reason. But the lead editorial in Friday's Press-Scimitar interlarded some noble expressions with insensitive chauvinism: " . . . Dr. King, evangelist of civil rights, was cut down -- and deplorably in Memphis, one of the cities which has been moving most steadily toward the goals he advocated -- by the force he preached against: the violence of extremism." Again: " . . . his (the assassin's) act was a frightful disservice to the country, and an especially stunning blow to Memphis." And again: "He (the assassin) has stained the nation and our city in the eyes of much of the world . . . ."

Nor could the paper refrain from reiterating, even on that sorrowful day, an opinion well-formed and oft-repeated among white Memphians:

> While granting him complete sincerity as to nonviolent purpose, the Press-Scimitar has felt -- and warned many times -- that his methods tended to produce violence, both sympathetic and antagonistic. This was due to the highly emotional nature of his speeches. The record of his visits to many cities, and at last Memphis, all too starkly bore out this warning.

On Sunday morning, Memphis citizens on their way to church passed police cruisers with four officers in each. The men wore blue riot helmets with heavy plastic visors. On their radios citizens might have heard a recorded message, mindlessly played by a local station, in which Mayor Loeb urged citizens to contribute to the Arts Council Drive, because the arts and culture "are the things that make a city great."

In a fashionable white church, a minister led the congregation in a prayer of confession. It acknowledged their implication in the assassination by their "failure to speak out clearly and quickly." It also acknowledged that "we cannot wash blood from our hands by pouring water over ourselves."

There were about half-a-dozen Negroes in the congregation at that service. Asked about them, one of the ministers explained ruefully that they were not members or even regular attendants, but had been invited especially on that day by some members who had Negro friends. "You may have noticed," he remarked, "that they were well looked after."

In contrast, the pastor of a Negro church, meanwhile, was telling his congregation that he had received a multitude of reports of abuses of Negroes by police and National Guardsmen, especially the latter.

The minister asked his parishioners to wire the President to request trained army regulars instead of National Guardsmen from rural Tennessee.

MEMPHIS CARES - BUT NOT MUCH

The Memphis Ministers' Association had scheduled a memorial service for two o'clock on Sunday afternoon in Evergreen Presbyterian Church. A group led by a Memphis businessman and calling itself the "Memphis Does Care Committee" suggested that a larger "Memphis Cares" meeting be held instead, in E. H. Crump Stadium. The ministers acquiesced.

About 5,000 people attended the "Memphis Cares" meeting. The racial composition of the crowd was about the same as that of the city's half million population --

60 per cent white and 40 per cent Negro. Attendance at the meeting had been urged by virtually all ministers at their services that morning and on television by dignitaries, including Mayor Loeb, all day Saturday.

Those attending were handed a printed program as they entered the stadium. It carried the following statement:

> We live in Memphis. It has been a good city, but far from perfect -- much less perfect than many of us realized. Something happened here which laid bare a side of our common life to which all too many of us had been blind.
> We are brother Memphians in name. We can become so in fact as we have never been before. We will not leave this to someone else, but each of us will take the responsibility upon himself.
> Our goal is a city in which a man's honest and openly expressed opinion can be respected, without fear of punishment or retaliation, and differences resolved in the understanding that we are all human.
> We therefore solemnly, in the presence of God and of one another, pledge ourselves -- our time, our effort, our resources -- and if need be, our lives themselves -- to the building of a city where people can trust one another, respect one another, and respond to the needs of one another.
> Memphis cares.

On the back of the program was a small section in which were printed the two words "I Care." A line for a signature was beneath them. Memphians attending were asked to sign this two-word statement, tear off the section, and drop it into a receptacle before leaving.

The program itself was very simple. It consisted of the national anthem, an invocation, a hymn ("O God, Our Help In Ages Past"), an introductory statement, statements by eight "Memphians Who Care," unison reading of the "Memphis Cares" statement, a singing of "God Bless America," and the benediction.

The first of the eight speakers said, "The time has come when you must stand and be counted . . . choose your ground and stand on it." He did not suggest what ground. (It was learned later that those who planned the program sought to exclude specific mention of (1) the garbage strike, or (2) Dr. Martin Luther King. This prohibition was ignored by at least three of the speakers.)

Tommy Powell, head of Memphis' Central Labor Council, AFL-CIO, was the fifth speaker. He drew applause when he affirmed a laboring man's right to a recognized union. ("Look!" said one Negro to his wife. "There are some white folks applauding.") The loudest applause of the afternoon came in response to Mr. Powell's call for news media to present fairly and impartially both sides of issues.

The sixth speaker was Judge Ben Hooks, a Negro. He said that Martin Luther King was much misunderstood because the news media "will not tell the truth." Again there was loud applause on that point.

During the fifth and sixth talks, a reporter noticed a large number of white people drifting out of the stands -- a hundred or more. There was no obvious reason for this, so during the seventh speech -- by a businessman named Tom O'Ryan -- the reporter began asking a few of these departing what they thought of the meeting.

"You see me leaving, don't you?" snorted one elderly gentleman. Asked if he would say what he disliked about the meeting, he grumped, "Not for quotation," and kept walking.

The question was asked of two young men next. "That Irish fellow told it like it was," one of them replied. "A dual effort. I'm a young man, and I've never done anything to oppress a nigra . . . They're not going to ravage through the streets and endanger my family . . . If they want to practice what they preach, okay with me, but it's going to have to be a fifty-fifty proposition."

Another elderly man on his way out volunteered good-naturedly, "This thing has turned into a nigger protest meeting, hasn't it?" He explained that he had thought it was to be a memorial service for Dr. King. He was glad so many whites had come to show that they cared, "regardless of what they hear . . . But I don't like these nigger preachers making all those rabble-rousing speeches."

Two middle-aged women were next. "I'm disappointed," one said. "I came to support the mayor and the city, not to honor King -- although I'm sorry . . . I do feel that it's good that Negroes and whites can sit together like this. It certainly does no harm . . . I'm just sorry the mayor is not here. He's in a tough spot. He needs support."

By that time the meeting had ended. A Negro man was asked what he thought of it. "Nice meeting," he answered, "if they do what they say; not say one thing, then turn around and do something else."

A white man and his wife, with their son, were among the last to leave. The boy, about eight years old, was wearing a "Charlie Brown" sweatshirt which read, on the back, "HOW CAN WE LOSE WHEN WE'RE SO SINCERE?"

"That was about the right shirt to wear, wasn't it?" the father asked. He said he felt "sort of two ways" about the meeting. He too thought "the Irishman" had put it best -- that it is something for the whole community to work out, not just the whites. He was fatalistic. "It's been this way since time began. There's no reason to think this will change things very much for very long."

This wholesome-looking family had recently moved to Memphis from Houston, where they had lived when President Kennedy passed through en route to Dallas. The man said the atmosphere in Memphis before Dr. King arrived was much like it was in Houston before President Kennedy came through -- "people said they wished he were dead." "And since King was shot," he went on, "I have heard numerous comments to the effect that they are not sorry he was shot -- just sorry it happened here."

A policeman directing traffic at the gate of the stadium motioned a Negro motorist toward a different lane, yelling, "Pull it on over here, boy!"

One reporter viewing the crowd had said before the meeting began, "Memphis cares -- but not much."

THE MASON TEMPLE MEETING

Far more than 5,000 people, all but a tiny fraction of them Negroes, gathered later that afternoon in the Mason Temple of the Church of God in Christ. The multitude rippled with the movement of life and vibrated with its sound.

They heard Jerry Wurf, International President of the striking union, tell them that "if it has to go on for a week or a month or a year, these men are prepared to go on!"

They heard Tommy Powell declare that he had been dissuaded, by some of "supposedly goodwill," from saying something he had wanted to say at the "Memphis Cares" meeting. They had admonished him that it would be "too political." "But I want to ask you here to join the Memphis Labor Council in calling for the resignation of Mayor Loeb!" In an instant the people were on their feet and cheering.

They heard and loved the inimitable Dr. Ralph Jackson:

"I'm sick and tired of white people trying to ease their consciences by calling in a few of us to talk to them . . . It's time for them to spit -- I said spit -- or get off the pot!"

He told the people that, if Dr. King could give up his life, they could give up a day's work to make the march the next day. "We want everybody on that march. We want everybody! We want everybody! Everybody! Everybody! Everybody! Get on the telephone and tell everybody! Tell everybody to tell everybody! Tell everybody to tell everybody to tell everybody!"

THE MEMORIAL MARCH

Federal Judge Bailey Brown had agreed on Friday, April 5, to lift the ban he had issued against a march on the following Monday. His cancellation of the restraining order was subject to an eight-point agreement:

(1) The march had to begin after nine a. m. and end by five p. m.

(2) Marchers had to walk no more than eight abreast.

(3) There had to be internal policing, by persons selected and trained as marshals by march leaders.

(4) Placards could be carried, but could not be mounted on sticks.

(5) There would be no limit on the number of marchers.

(6) There would be no minimum age for marchers.

(7) Young people and older people had to be well mixed in the line of march.

(8) Arrangements had to be made for fast, high-level consultation with the court and police to take care of contingencies.

This agreement was negotiated by Bayard Rustin and his assistant, Norman Hill, both of whom accepted much of the responsibility for organizing the march, with the help of the few SCLC staffers who could be spared from funeral preparations in Atlanta.

Plans called for 500 marshals -- young militants among them -- 50 captains, and 20 chief marshals. There would be a public address system sufficient for a crowd of 40,000. Three principal messages were printed on hundreds of placards: "UNION JUSTICE NOW," "HONOR KING: END RACISM," and "I AM A MAN."

Monday was a cool, slate-grey day. A threatened rain never materialized. People started gathering at Clayborn Temple before eight o'clock, although the appointed hour was ten o'clock -- the march to begin promptly at eleven.

Unionists arrived from all over the country. A very large delegation came from the New York United Federation of Teachers, AFL-CIO. Just a few of the others represented were the Texas AFL-CIO; the Maritime Union; the Councils of American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees from Michigan, Arkansas, New York, and Louisiana; and the "Cincinnati Labor Movement."

There were civil rights groups from Chicago, Milwaukee, Forest Park, and Peoria, Illinois. There were representatives of the New York School of Social Work and of the Negro Benevolent Society, Inc., Department of Sanitation, City of New York.

Mrs. King's plane had been delayed in leaving Atlanta because of weather conditions, but the march was begun at eleven-twenty anyway. Two huge trailers had been so placed on Hernando Street as to form a funnel through which only eight people could pass abreast, and the march started through that passage.

The Rev. Mr. James Lawson and Dr. Ralph Jackson led the way. The front rank also included Walter Reuther; T. O. Jones, president of the striking local; Jerry Wurf; and Dr. Benjamin Spock.

There were quite a few local white ministers in the march. There were members of the militant "INVADERS" wearing yellow arm bands to indicate that they were marshals. Councilman Jerry Blanshard, the only white member of the city council to vote with the three Negro members throughout the dispute, marched near the front.

Silently the march passed battle-geared, helmeted Guardsmen stationed in front of a fire station, construction sites, and vulnerable store windows. Double ranks of Guardsmen sealed off all side streets. They stood at parade rest, the muxxles of their rifles thrust out before them at arm's length. Unsheathed bayonets pointed upward toward the line of march like the points of a listing picket fence. For the most part, the Guardsmen looked straight ahead, but could not keep their eyes from following a bearded young photographer with flowing locks who minced past them on sockless feet.

Guardsmen were visible on the roofs of tall buildings. A city policeman stood at the corner of Linden and Main with an automatic weapon at the ready. A motorcycled "special officer" with a bolt-action rifle slung on his back idled his rumbling machine alongside the silent marchers.

There was a delay of about ten minutes at Main and Beale. Then, at eleven-fifty-five, Mrs. King took position at the head of the march, along with the Reverend Messrs.

Abernathy, Young, and Williams of the SCLC staff, and Harry Belafonte.

One marcher wore a T-shirt lettered, "I Had A Dream -- 4-8-68." Another walked in striped prison trousers and carried a sign that read "Out With Loeb and His Butchers."

A man in the rank behind Councilman Blanshard carried a high frequency radio receiver tuned to the police band. Mr. Blanshard told another marcher he was mortified to hear the police dispatcher repeatedly give directions like "Large number of male niggers at Main and Union . . ." or "Two niggers spotted in window on north side of the hotel . . . ."

On the sidelines, some spectators had climbed into a display window out of which the glass had been broken during the March 28 "riot." A sign on the intact window of one shop read "Closed Monday in Memoriam to Dr. Martin Luther King." There was a floral spray on the door. The display compartments were bare -- just in case.

Two elderly Negro women stood weeping and wiping their eyes. One old Negro man said to another, "Well, we've lived to see some history."

There were many young Negroes in the march. A sizeable number of bitter-loooking, hard-eyed teenagers walked along behind spectators, occasionally stopping to watch. Four or five of them stopped to talk in the entry of a vacant store. One idly stood on tiptoe and picked up a broken piece of heavy wooden molding from the top of a column. He hefted it a couple of times with his hand, then, grinning, replaced it.

As that group moved on down the sidewalk, another member of it grinned at his buddies and asked jokingly, "Ya'll ready now?"

Three tough-looking young white men stood on the curb monitoring police calls on a portable receiver and making comments. As a group from the Amalgamated Clothing Workers passed, carrying their identifying sign, one of this trio said, "Aglamated . . . algam . . . what's that?" And one of his friends replied, "Don't know. Must be some kind of sick nuts."

Another group of three or four whites were laughing on a corner. They kept glancing appreciatively at the National Guardsmen stationed there. "They better not start a riot," one remarked. "Yeah," his friend agreed with a smile and a nod toward the troops. "If they start a riot, there's gonna be a big funeral in Memphis."

The ceremonies were started in the plaza in front of city hall before even half of the marchers had filed in. They were still coming, four abreast, when the speech-making was more than half over.

There were brief remarks by Ossie Davis, Harry Belafonte, Mrs. King, Jerry Wurf, Dr. Spock, Dr. Ralph Jackson, and James Bevel. Congressman John Conyers of Michigan introduced Mrs. Rosa Parks and Congressman William F. Ryan of New York.

The principal address by the Rev. Ralph Abernathy was, in the main, an expression of determination. "We are on our way to Washington," he said. "It became necessary for us to detour by way of Memphis . . . We are going to Washington, but we are going to stay here in Memphis until this problem is solved."

After he had spoken, Don Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Division brought a message from George Meany, president of the organization. "The struggle of the sanitation workers here in Memphis is the struggle of all organized labor." He looked forward to black and white working together in a solid program, "starting today."

Walter Reuther announced a donation of $50,000 from the United Auto Workers strike fund to Memphis sanitation men. He added, "I want to say to the mayor that, if it takes more than this, there will be more coming." (On the same day that Dr. King was murdered, the AFL-CIO donated $20,000 to start off a nationwide appeal to unions for funds for the Memphis strike.)

BACK-THE-MAYOR CAMPAIGN

Determination seemed no less on the other side. A local newspaper the next day reported that the Jackson Avenue Lions Club had sent Mayor Loeb a telegram stating that the club was "standing 100 per cent behind you." The message had the approval of the Lions Club International, according to the article.

It was also reported that a letter and telegram campaign in support of the mayor was underway. Apparently it was organized very well indeed. As of that date, the mayor had received 1,809 telegrams backing his stand. Of 22 telegrams opposing,it, only seven were local. There were 307 letters favorable to the mayor. Of 56 unfavorable letters, only 14 were local. Fifteen letters of support had been received by special delivery before the regular mail delivery on that day. More than 1,000 signatures had been obtained on petitions of support for Mayor Loeb.

Mrs. Bee Clark, who heads the Western Union credit department in Memphis, said, "Everybody in town is sending telegrams. I've never seen anything like it. You would think it was the end of the world."

STRIKE SETTLEMENT

Shortly before the assassination Mayor Loeb had said,

"I'll never be known as the mayor who signed a contract with a Negro union." Until the tenth week of the strike and for 12 days after the assassination, he kept that vow.

Undersecretary of Labor James Reynolds arrived in Memphis the day after Dr. King's murder. He had orders from President Johnson to mediate in the labor dispute. There had been no attempt at federal intervention before, despite the outbreak of violence on March 28. The first Southern Regional Council report on Memphis noted the failure of "other agencies of government, state and federal, which might be expected to act toward mediation and reconciliation when a city did not." Only after murder did action come on this level, as in the Congress of the United States with passage of the 1968 Civil Rights Law, and in other matters which must have seemed to Negroes "too little, too late." Non-binding mediation had been initiated locally with the very capable help of Frank B. Miles, former labor leader and Department of Labor mediator, whose services were donated by the Memphis lumber company which presently employs him. Those negotiations had collapsed before the assassination.

Finally, on April 16, an agreement was reached. The union won recognition by resolution of the city council -- a better form than they had anticipated, as union negotiators had previously suggested a mere exchange of letters as a face-saving device for the mayor. A contract included union dues check-off through the city employees' credit union, a good grievance procedure, and wage increases of ten cents per hour May 1 and another five cents in September. The period of the contract was 14 months. Members of Local 1733 approved the agreement unanimously. The city council vote was 12 to 1.

Memphis Negro ministers plan to continue the organization they formed to support the strike. (It was called Community on the Move for Equality, or C.O.M.E.) Mass meetings on a regular basis have been discontinued. The general boycott of downtown stores has been called off, but not the one against Memphis' two newspapers. Selective boycotts are planned, aimed at securing jobs for Negroes and business investment in the black community. A group of 1,000 Negro women is being organized to back these and other efforts.

MEMPHIS, A MICROCOSM

So, in Memphis, black people successfully asserted their manhood and dignity and won a point of justice -- but at a terrible cost. If that is the end of the matter, what will really have been proved is that in Memphis, in America, justice costs too dear -- and, perhaps, that liberty is less likely than death. There can be little doubt that Mayor Loeb and the city fathers of Memphis were faithfully reflecting the temper of whites in their city. By many indications they were reflecting, as well, the mood of the nation.

Amid all of the racism still obvious in Memphis there were faint, hopeful signs of change. For one thing, as we have seen, some white clergymen at last were moved by the situation. For another, the Chamber of Commerce scheduled, one day after the settlement, a serious meeting of local businessmen with Negro and white ministers to talk about a large-scale program of employment and on-the-job training. Observers said that growing pressure from the business community was an important factor in moving the mayor and city council to settle the strike. In calling for the original boycott, Negro ministers had told their followers that "Loeb won't listen to you, but he will listen to the downtown merchants." In itself, the merchants' response to economic pressure may mean only the sort of tokenism which pragmatic businessmen in many southern cities have advocated, particularly on the issue of school desegregation, as the minimum change necessary to avoid economic loss. It remains to be seen, of course, whether the existing unity and determination of Negroes in Memphis will continue, and whether political, industrial, and civic leaders have really learned anything about responding to protest or from the murder of one of America's greatest men.

The same is true of the nation. An article in the New York Times (April 14, 1968) reported that a new strategy for handling riots has been worked out by Attorney General Ramsey Clark and others, including Deputy Secretary of Defense Cyrus Vance. The method was tested in some cities during Negro outbreaks following the assassination. Both as a matter of tactical necessity ("the other side has guns") and for humane reasons, the new strategy calls for massing large numbers of law officers and troops, using tear gas extensively, but refraining from firing upon people -- even looters and arsonists. Proponents of the plan argue that this technique in fact minimizes property damage as well as deaths, although they frankly say that human life must be valued above property. It is perhaps significant that none of the disorders where the method was used developed into full-scale riots, thus saving property as well as lives.

At almost the same time, however, the mayor of Chicago insisted that arsonists are, in effect, murderers. He ordered Chicago law officers to "shoot to kill" anyone caught in the act of arson. He also ordered them to "shoot to maim or cripple" anyone looting. (New York's Mayor Lindsay pointed out that many who were shot as "looters" in the 1967 riots were, in fact, innocent.)

It remains to be seen, therefore, in America as in Memphis, whether the ruling majority will insist on brutal measures of repression, easier in the short run, in response to minorities which protest grievances. It should be clear by now that Negroes and other minorities cannot allow present conditions to continue and, in the absence of redress of legitimate grievances, will use ever-stronger forms of protest. It should also be clear that a few, especially among the young, have despaired and, in frustration and anger, may resort to violence -- against property, if not against people.

A former mayor is fond of saying that Memphis is "always doing the right thing for the wrong reason" -- meaning that the city takes right action only when necessary to prevent a loss to its good image or economy.

It is to be hoped that Memphis has learned from its travail to respond to legitimate protest in a timely manner, to respond with dignity to citizens acting with dignity. The alternative is clear: unavoidable escalation of protest, bringing white violence against black protestors (the common southern pattern), and danger of the newer pattern of Negro violence against property, with indignity and tragedy for all.

The fundamental issues of quality education, housing, and jobs -- and the dignity of which they are part -- are not settled in Memphis or elsewhere in the nation. Memphis is America in microcosm. The sickness which led to the death of Dr. King can lead to the death of the United States. The only atonement for this murder, the only hope of national survival, is fast, full action to remedy the wrongs of racism.

A Council to attain the ideals and practices of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South

FIELD ACTIVITIES NEWSLETTER
August 9, 1968

This is to say goodbye and, at the suggestion of Paul Anthony, to tell you a little about what the SRC is doing that involves my moving.

Before the end of August we Stanfields will be moving to Austin, Texas, where I am to be executive director of a new agency, the "Southwest Intergroup Relations Council." SIRC will be a counterpart in the Southwest to the Southern Regional Council. It will be multi-ethnic, its membership composed of Mexican-Americans and Indian-Americans, as well as Negroes and Anglos. It will work in an eight state region, including Texas, Oklahoma, New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, Nevada, Utah, and California, -- roughly, those states having a large Mexican-American minority, a large Indian-American minority, or both.

The steering committee for the SIRC has made an arrangement with the SRC whereby I shall continue on the staff of the SRC for up to six months, but shall be assigned to the SIRC with an allowance for travel and related expenses. After that the SIRC will be "on its own" -- for better or for worse, for richer or for poorer, in sickness or in health.

The steering committee for the new agency envisions an eventual membership of about 300 and a Board of Directors of 50. Knowledge and experience in ethnic-group problems and intergroup relations, geographic representativeness, and ethnic representativeness will be important considerations in choosing members. Care will also be taken to assure that poor people, young people, and -- yes -- women will be well-represented in the membership and policy group. New members and Board members will be elected on nomination by a membership committee. The majority of that committee will be chosen by the existing membership on nomination by various ethnic-group organizations. These organizations, community organizations, and institutions may join a "Cabinet of Organizations" on which the SIRC will rely for advice and consultation.

The new agency will be incorporated in the State of Texas and will locate its office in Austin, at least for an interim. (The steering committee left open the possibility of moving to a city more central to the region at a later date.)

Much of the credit for instigating this new agency must go to Professor Joseph P. Witherspoon of the University of Texas School of Law. Mr. Witherspoon is a distinguished legal scholar and teacher. He is also a community leader in Austin. Among other things, he has been instrumental in securing an effectively-structured Community Relations Commission in Austin and in getting reforms in the local police department. He has made himself an expert on civil rights law and its enforcement. It was Professor Witherspoon who convened an ad hoc committee, which in turn selected a steering committee, for a Southwest Intergroup Relations Council.

Other members of the steering committee are:

--Mario Obledo, recently selected as General Counsel for the new Mexican American Legal Defense Fund, San Antonio, and formerly Assistant Attorney General of Texas;

--The Reverend Henry J. Casso, San Antonio, Civil Rights Chairman, Texas League of United Latin American Citizens (LULAC);

--Mrs. Lorella M. Salazar, Bernalillo, New Mexico, an employee of the Sandia Corporation (industrial relations) and formerly head of the Albuquerque office of Senator Anderson of New Mexico;

--R. P. (Bob) Sanchez, McAllen, Texas, Labor and civil rights attorney, and leader in the American G. I. Forum;

--Clarence A. Laws, former executive secretary of the Texas NAACP, now Regional Director for Civil Rights, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Dallas;

--The Reverend C. William Black, San Antonio pastor;

--John B. White, President of the Oklahoma Equal Opportunity Association, Oklahoma City;

--T. D. Armstrong, Galveston, Texas, businessman;

--The Reverend Charles E. Sanders, Secretary of the Original Cherokee Community Organization, Stilwell, Oklahoma;

--Stuart Trapp, Legal Counsel, Original Cherokee Community Organization, Tahlequah, Oklahoma;

--Vine Deloria, past executive director of the National Congress of American Indians, and now a law student at the University of Colorado in Boulder.

--William Canby, Peace Corps Director in Uganda, 1964-66, and now Professor of Law and Director of the Office of Indian Law, Arizona State University, Tempe, Arizona;

--Robert A. Beer, president of Robert Beer and Company, Realtors, and Vice-President of the Dallas Real Estate Board.

While we leave Atlanta with reluctance and certainly will miss our associates here, I am excited, of course, about the possibilities of the SIRC.

Our home address, after August 26, will be 2801 Silverway Drive, Austin, Texas 78757.

The University of Texas at Arlington
Arlington, Texas 76010

Dear Dr. Weiss:

Thank you for your letter of March 11. We shall be glad to help in any way we can with the Human Relations Resource Center and Seminar Program.

Enclosed are two bibliographies from the Curriculum Consultation Service and one copy of our publications list. Please note that you may take advantage of our publications subscription service, which would assure your getting all of our publications at once.

It was a pleasure meeting you, and we wish you well in this worthwhile undertaking.

Cordially,

Under separate cover we are sending free copies of the three reports we have issued so far in 1968.

(Carole - sign and mail. Also mail, separate cover, Delta Phoenix, Orangeburg, and Black Youth.)

GRANT-IN-AID CONDITIONS

1. All grants are contingent upon the ability of the SRC to raise the total grant-in-aid budget. Should this not be possible, the necessary reductions will be made on a pro rata basis.

2. One-fourth of the total projected grant-in-aid to each council will be paid on the first of each quarter of the calendar year, subject to receipt of the required reports due and to fulfillment of all other grant conditions.

3. The required reports are:

a. One copy of an audit by a Certified Public Accountant for the Council's last fiscal year. If an audit has not been received by July 1, the quarterly payment then due will be suspended automatically, pending action of the SRC's Executive Committee.

b. A list of the names and addresses of officers and policy board members of the state council and the chairman (or presidents) of all local councils as of January 1, 1967. Revisions should be sent when made.

c. Two copies of an adequate, orderly program report for each quarter. If, in the judgment of the SRC staff, this report is not satisfactory, grant payments will be suspended pending adequate amendment or action of the Executive Committee.

d. Two copies of a monthly financial statement showing receipts for the month and for the fiscal year to date from each of the following categories: SRC Grants-in-Aid, Foundations, Membership Dues, Individual Contributions, Business Contributions, and Miscellaneous (sale of literature, dinners, etc.). A similar breakdown of expenditures for the month and year to date for all budget and non-budget items is suggested.

e. Two copies of a monthly report on membership showing chapter-by-chapter the number of dues-paid members enrolled or re-enrolled during the month and during the membership year to date. Categories for out-of-state and at-large members should be included.

4. In keeping with the general purpose of the grant-in-aid program, to facilitate growth of state councils into basically self-sustaining membership organizations, it is expected that staff strength and income from local sources will be maintained at least at the 1966 level. If, in the judgment of the SRC staff, the funding and staffing of a council falls below that level, grant payments will be suspended pending action of the Executive Committee.

STATEMENT OF THE THIRD WORLD LIBERATION FRONT

PHILOSOPHY AND GOALS

The Third World Liberation Front is composed of peoples who are opposed to the present oppressive system in America, as based on the anglo-saxon racist philosophy, and as this enslaving and colonialist oppression is extended to our brothers throughout the world. The purpose of the TWLF is to initiate discussion and develop programs pertinent to the needs of the Third World students. The TWLF of San Francisco State College has as its purpose to aid in further developing politically, economically, and culturally the revolutionary Third World consciousness of racist-oppressed peoples both on and off campus. As Third World students, as Third World people, as so-called minorities, we are being exploited to the fullest extent in this racist white America and we are therefore prepariang ourselves and our people for a prolonged struggle for freedom from this yoke of oppression.

The TWLF recognizes the struggles for freedom of non-white peoples around the world as a positive part of our educational processes. We are a third world organization. We adhere to the struggles in Asia, Africa, and Latin America, ideologically, spiritually, and culturally.

We seek, as members of the TWLF of San Francisco State College, simply to function as human beings, to control our own destinies. Initially, following the myth of the American Dream, we worked too hard to attend predominantly white colleges, but we have learned through direct analysis that it is impossible for our people, so-called minorities, to function as human beings in a racist society in which white always comes first and anything else is synonomous with enemy, no matter what the attainment, educarional or otherwise. So we have decided to fuse ourselves with the masses of Third World people, which are the majority of the world's peoples, to create, through struggle, a new humanism, a New World Consciousness, and within that context collectively control our own destinies.

The TWLF will require various officers, coordinators, and staff, paid and voluntary. We will involve ourselves and be affiliated with other organizations and special projects which relate to our needs and objectives. We intend to present programs of Third World arts and thoughts in the Gallery Lounge and elsewhere, utilizing talents of the third world people both on and off campus.

We shall move to more closely associate ourselves with Third World communities to aid in organizing our people around the issues which directly affect their lives. We must also associate oursleves with the organizations which most directly relate to the needs of third world people. One final note on the development of the TWLF: we offer a positive program. We are not anti-white; we are anti-white-racist-oppression, and it is this powerful and just determinant that is the genesis of our movement, but the growth of the movement is affirmative: an affirmation of our humanity, our strength, our beauty, our dignity and our pride. Our programs are working programs. Our direction is revolutionary. Our method is organization. Our goal is Third World Power. Our essence is a New World Consciousness of oppressed peoples.

WHAT WE BELIEVE:

1. We believe that Black people will not be free until we are able to determine our destiny.

2. We believe that the Federal Government is responsible and obligated to give every man employment or a guaranteed income.
We believe that if the White American Business man will not give full employment, then the means of production should be taken from the business men and placed in the community so that the people of the community can organize and employ all of its people and give a high standard of living.

3. We believe that this Racist Government has robbed us and now we are demanding the overdue debt of forty acres and two mules. Forty acres and two mules was promised 100 Years ago as retribution for slave labor and mass murder of Black People. We will accept the payment in currency which will be distributed to our many communities. The Germans are now aiding the Jews in Israel for the genocide of the Jewish people. The Germans murdered 6,000,000 Jews. The American Racist has taken part in the slaughter of over 50,000,000 Black People. Therefore, we feel that this is a modest demand that we make.

4. We believe that if the White landlords will not give decent housing to our Black community, then the housing and the land should be made into co-operatives so that our community, with government aide, can build and make decent housing for its people.

5. We believe in an educational system that will give to our people a knowledge of self. If a man does not have knowledge of himself and his position in society and the world, then he has little chance to relate to anything else.

6. We believe that Black People should not be forced to fight in the military service to defend a Racist government that does not protect us. We will not fight and kill other people of color in the world who, like Black People, are being victimized by the White Racist Government of America. We will protect ourselves from the force and violence of the Racist Police and the Racist Military, by whatever means necessary.

7. We believe we can end police brutality in our Black communities by organizing Black Self Defense groups that are dedicated to defending our Black community from racist police oppression and brutality. The second amendment of the constitution of the Unites States gives us a right to bear arms. We therefore believe that all Black people should arm themselves for self defense.

8. We beleive all Black people should be released from the many jails all prisons because they not received a fair and impartial trial.

9. We Believe that the courts should follow the United States constitution so that Black people will receive fair trails. The 14th amendment of the U.S. constitution gives a man a right to be tried by his peer group. A peer is a person from a similar economical, social, religious, geographical, enviornmental, historical and racial background. To do this the court will be forced to select a jury from the Black community from which the Black defendent came. We have been, and are being tried by all white juries that have no understanding of the "Average Reasoning Man" of the Black community.

10. When in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bonds which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to separation.

We hold these Truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed,-- That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute men government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes: and accordingly all experience hate shewn, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuse and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under abosolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty. To throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security.

SUGGESTIONS FOR ARTICLE ON HOUSING

Montgomery would provide an excellent example of how various government projects are used by the local power structure at the Negroes' expense.

1. It should be shown how local real estate interests have banded together and predetermined certain decaying white areas to become Negro areas. There are three: (1) Virginia Avenue area -- North of Jeff Davis Avenue, (2) Kaye Street area -- between Court Street (white) and Cleveland Avenue (Negro), North of Marshall Street, and (3) Terrace Avenue, near the Negro college, Alabama State. Through interviews, case histories could be recorded of exhorbitant prices charged for these old houses. Conversely, there are isolated cases where prominent whites have arranged for their personal servants to come out very well. Fred Ball, prominent lawyer, has helped an aged seamstress, Georgia Brown, to purchase a good house on Virginia Avenue at little more than the amount she got for the one she lost to the Interstate.

2. There are two major Interstate Highways being built through town, largely through Negro residential areas.

Data should be obtained on the ratio of Negro ownership in the demolished houses as compared with untouched areas. On one street, Tuscaloosa Street, most of the well-to-do Negroes lived, and fought the losee of their homes for several years. The location of the Interstate seems to have been carefully planned to displace the largest number of Negro home owners.

3. The Houston Hill Urban Renewal Project took a large number of Negro homes many Negro owned. Mrs. Willease Simpson say they were promised the option of repurchase, but were not given it. Two new streets of homes were built, but contain only a fraction of the families displaced. The rest of the land is commercial. The new homes are for those in the upper income bracket in the Negro community, but border on undesirable businesses and are separated from them by high anchor fences.

4. A new low cost project of 500 homes was built on the outskirts of town in a low, almost swampy area, very inaccessible and almost impossible for people whose job demand irregular hours.

5. Levi Watkins, Negro President of Alabama State College, is a Wallace appointee, hated by the Negroes. He has saved his professors' homes, but the rest of the area has been razed for enlargement of the college, all under a government grant.

6. It is said that some Negroes are awarded sums of about $4,000 for a house, then have welfare funds taken away until they use up the money they got for the house. It is not enough to buy another. (Mrs. Bert Will, Sr., bears such a case, but she has to be approached with caution, as she is a staunch segregationist).

The Office of the Urban Renewal Agency in Montgomery, (Mrs. Elizabeth Hobbie Wright, has all the data on number of families displaced and new units built.

An article covering the great change in the city due to these many government projects, and how the Negro is suffering from it, could make good reading.

POOR. A family is classified as poor if its total 1969 income is less than the 1969 poverty level. Using criteria established by the Social Security Administration, the Census Bureau established various poverty levels depending on the size of the family, the sex of the family head, and farm and nonfarm residence. For instance, the poverty level for a nonfarm family of four with a female head was $3725 in 1969.

INTRODUCTION

In a time of economic recession and inflation the persistence of poverty in the South takes on special significance. Inflation in the South, for instance, has grown at a higher rate than in the nation as a whole. Moreover, the method of computing those in poverty fails to take into account an extremely important factor. Items in family budgets which had the most rapid price increase—food, housing, transportation—constitute a far greater share of poor people's expenditures than of those in middle income groups. Poverty levels established in 1964-65 are updated each year to reflect changes in the cost of living by the increase in the total consumer price index. But beginning in 1972, accelerating in 1973 and 1974 the price increase in the items for which the poor spend their money has been greater than in the total index. What this means is that since 1972 the number of actual poor has been understated and that as inflation continues, especially in food prices, the number will continue to be understated.

This study, essentially a statistical analysis of regional poverty data derived from the 1970 Census, illustrates that well before the present crisis in the nation's economy the South had a larger proportional share of the nation's poor than the remaining 39 states. It is also clear that a significantly large number of Southerners, not classified as poor, were living on incomes that put them perilously close to poverty levels.

The census of 1970, we would point out, represented the first time that the Census Bureau had collected poverty data on the scale reported here. Our purpose in presenting an examination of the regional data is to identify the South's poor in detail in order to provide a statistical base for remedial action. Several major findings, with broad policy implications, emerge from our analysis.

- Poverty among Southern blacks, as has historically been the case, remains more intense than among whites, although in absolute numbers more whites are poor than blacks.
- Poverty rates in rural areas, not unexpectedly, were uniformly higher than in urban areas.
- The percentage of poor families headed by females was far greater than those headed by males. Black female headed families are particularly vulnerable. As a result, the South's poverty bears heavily on the children of the region, since most female-headed families—of both races—contain children.
- Work is no guarantee against poverty. The majority of Southern poor, in fact, do work, but do not earn enough to raise their families' income above poverty levels.
- The industrial structure of the South in 1970 was more heavily concentrated in low wage industries than was true in the rest of the nation.
- Only a very small percentage of Southern families received public assistance in 1970. All states defined need at levels lower than the federally established poverty line. In most Southern states maximum payments were far below even the states' own established need levels. The result of such policies was inevitable: public assistance helped only a small fraction of the poor to move out of poverty.
- Although overall the rate of participation in Social Security by the South's elderly was only slightly below that of the elderly in the rest of the nation, participation among elderly blacks was far below national averages. This was so because elderly blacks during their work years were heavily concentrated in domestic work and farm labor, jobs that only during the past two decades have come under the Social Security Act.

• Southerners have received less formal education than the nation's population as a whole. Among the poor the percentage with a high school education is still alarmingly low.

Detailed policy recommendations to reach the causes of regional poverty are beyond the scope of the present study, but the need for certain broad measures is clear.

Public education in the South should provide for equitable financing of schools in order to bring a higher quality of education to children in poverty areas.

There must be adequate funds for manpower programs that will enhance individual earning opportunities, improve productivity and contribute to economic development. Such programs should not only meet labor market demands, but provide special assistance to persons living in rural areas and in urban ghettos, to women, to youth, to minorities who have for so long borne the penalties of employment discrimination These programs should be linked with governmental economic development policies that will influence the location of jobs in poverty-heavy areas.

Social welfare programs should be focused toward bringing both the working poor and those not in the labor force to at least a minimum needs level, preferably to be determined by the federal government, on a uniform basis rather than by states. Existing programs should be strengthened, outreach efforts undertaken to enroll those eligible. For, almost by definition, the poor among us are those who benefit inadequately and inequitably from the normal workings of the economic and social order.

There remains the danger, however, in a period of national economic crisis that the problems of those at the very bottom of the economic ladder will be exacerbated. Programs designed to aid the poor have never been popular among the affluent, and today there are voices in the land calling for drastic cutbacks in social welfare programs as a panacea for halting inflation. We do not pretend to have the solution to the nation's current economic perplexities. But we do not believe that in a compassionate nation, at a time when more people—not fewer—will likely need the services of such programs that acceptable answers are to be found in penalizing those most victimized by, and least responsible for, the hard times that now beset us all.

Nor, finally, will the best interests of society be served by penalties that prevent those same people from finding a productive role. Back of each statistic in our report are flesh and blood people, adults who have never known any existence other than that of harsh, and shattering poverty, children whose childhoods are being needlessly blighted and whose potential for growth into useful citizens is being jeopardized, the elderly who are victims of their own failing strength and of society's indifference. Seen in such a light the statistics here take on a new and terrifying reality.

We present our data, then, with the hope that policymakers at every level of government and in the private sector will use it as the basis for formulation of policies and programs that both respond to basic human needs and open up opportunities for a full share in a productive society.

DATA SOURCES

The majority of data used in this report was derived from the 1970 Census of Population—either from the printed reports or computer summary tapes. The printed reports primarily used were:

U. S. Bureau of the Census, 1970 Census of Population, General Social and Economic Characteristics, PC(1)-C Series and Detailed Characteristics, PC (1)-D Series.

These will be referred to in the table sources as General Social and Economic Characteristics and Detailed Characteristics with further reference to the U. S. Summary and/or state volumes and to the Census tables from which these tables were computed.

The computer summary tapes used were the Fourth Count Summary Tapes which contain state summaries for data about the characteristics of the poor population among other subjects. In the table sources these tapes will be referred to as 4th Count Tapes. For a detailed description of the content and technical nature of the tapes see:

U. S. Bureau of the Census, 1970 Census Users' Guide, 1970, Part II.

All other sources, including the 1970 Census, are fully noted in the table sources.

Data in the text with source references such as Table 1, Table 5, etc. refer to full tables which follow each chapter.

CHAPTER I RESIDENCE AND POVERTY

SUMMARY

1. With only 25 percent of the nation's total population, the South contained 38 percent of the nation's poverty population.
2. The South's poverty rate was twice that of the remaining 39 states.
3. While in absolute numbers more poor families were headed by white males than any other race/sex grouping, the incidence of poverty was highest among black female-headed families. Two out of three such families in the South were poor, while one out of ten white male-headed families were poor.
4. The difference in poverty incidence between the South and the non-South was greatest for black males—nearly three times as severe in the South. Female-headed families showed little regional variation.
5. A larger percentage of the Southern poor (85 percent) were members of families than was true outside the South (74 percent) and a larger proportion of these Southern poor families were headed by males than in the non-South.
6. By residence type the highest poverty rate in the South was in rural areas—nearly one quarter of all families. But over half of black families in rural Southern areas were poor compared to 17 percent for rural Southern white families.
7. Poverty rates in Southern counties ranged from lows of four percent in two suburban Virginia counties to a high of 58 percent in Jefferson County, Mississippi.
8. Black families in Southern urban fringe areas were the least poor of all black residential groupings, but their poverty rate was higher than that of rural white families, the poorest white residential group. Black poverty incidence was three to four times that of whites in the same residential places.
9. The poverty incidence between urban and rural female-headed families was relatively slight compared to a nearly two-fold difference for male-headed families.
10. Poor families headed by females were more concentrated in urban areas than those headed by males, at least two-thirds compared to less than half of male heads.
11. The variation in poverty among Southern states ranged from a high in Mississippi of 30 percent to a low in Florida and Virginia of 12 to 13 percent. Black rates ranged from 2.5 to 4.3 times white rates in the Southern states.

In 1970 there were 27 million poor people[1] in the United States and ten million of them lived in the eleven states of the South.[2] Thus, while the South contained 25 percent of the nation's population, it contained 38 percent of its poor (Table 1). Such a disproportion resulted in a Southern poverty rate[3] of 21 percent compared to a national rate of 14 percent.

The intensity of the South's poverty is more apparent still when its 21 percent rate is compared to the eleven percent rate of the remaining 39 states. In brief, the South's poverty rate was double that of the non-South's.

*The Census data was collected in April, 1970. The determination of poverty was on the basis of the 1969 income. This is the case for the other tables in this report.
Ratio of the Southern poverty rate to the non-Southern rate.
Source: Computed from Tables 1 and 2.

[1]The poverty population are those whose income in 1969 fell below poverty levels (See Appendix B). The basis of the definition is the Department of Agriculture's economy food plan which is designed for "emergency or temporary use when funds are low." This diet is not meant for sustained and permanent use. In addition the diet is deficient in several nutrients (See Hunger U.S.A. Revisited, A Report by the Citizens' Board of Inquiry into Hunger and Malnutrition in the United States; the Southern Regional Council, and the National Council on Hunger and Malnutrition). This inadequate diet is priced and that amount is multiplied by three to derive a monetary value which is the poverty level. Various levels, depending on size of family and so on, are priced to derive the various poverty levels. Families who live on farms are assumed to raise part of their food, therefore their poverty levels are figured at 85 percent of the nonfarm level. This is in spite of the fact that the farm family may not be raising food. An alternative method of setting living standards is described in Chapter 5. This method, that of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, defines a minimum level according to a mix of goods and services and not just a food plan.

[2]Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

[3]The terms poverty incidence and poverty rate are used interchangeably and refer to the percent of a group who are poor, whose income falls below the poverty level appropriate to their characteristics. Throughout the report the distinction between "rate" and "absolute numbers" should be remembered.

Moreover, as the figures below illustrate, poverty rates for various population groups in the region also were approximately twice that of those outside the region.

Those persons not attached to families (unrelated individuals) were the group least affected by a regional differential.[4] Families headed by whites and families headed by females show less regional differential in poverty rates than the average, but families headed by blacks and families headed by males[5] show more.

When race and sex of the family head are considered together the greatest Southern differential in poverty rates is shown for black male-headed families—nearly three times that of the non-Southern rate.

*Ratio of the South poverty rate to the non-South rate.
Source: Non-South, computed from Table 2; South, Table 3.

The poverty rate for Southern black male-headed families contrasted to their counterparts outside the South is higher than would be expected from a regional difference alone. The relative poverty of black male-headed families in the South is also shown by their place in the ranking of poverty rates. In the South they are slightly more subject to poverty than white female-headed families, but in the non-South were half as subject to poverty as white female-headed families.

The regional variations in poverty rates should not detract from the facts of the rates within the South. The incidence of poverty among white male-headed families was one in ten; among white female and black male-headed families, about one in three; but for black female-headed families, two out of three.

The poverty rate for black female-headed families showed less regional difference than male-headed families' rates. Their rate is, however, the most severe within the region—twice as high as those for white female and black male-headed families and over six times that of white male-headed families. The rates for white female-headed families showed the least regional differential, but within the South were still three times as high as white male-headed families.

The higher poverty rates for blacks and for women, at the very least, indicate a need for more anti-discrimination activities in the South—increased enforcement of current statutes, passage of anti-discrimination legislation in jurisdictions where none exist, more diligently implemented affirmative action plans for public and private employers.

Composition of the Poor Population in the South and the Non-South

The poor population in the nation was in large part comprised of the very young and the old. In absolute numbers poor family heads were most often white and/or male. This was true for the South and for the rest of the nation. However, the profile of the poor in the South was not the same as in the rest of the nation. Relatively more of the Southern poor were family members compared to the non-South. Among the poor of the South were proportionally more children and non-elderly adults.

In view of the hard pressed circumstances of poor families, that 85 percent of the Southern poor remain within families is remarkable. There are advantageous aspects to this: income maximizing may be easier for groups than for individuals, public aid can be more efficient when it is combined with other income sources within the family, and the need for separate institutions for the poor (such as homes for the aged) may be smaller than if more poor were not in families.

Although proportionally fewer whites were heads of poor families in the South than in the non-South, they were still a majority of poor family heads. Of poor Southern families 1.3 million were white and 0.9 million, black and 39,000 other races.[6] Male-headed families were more prevalent among the South's poor

[1]Among the Southern poor were 762,000 unrelated individuals under 65 years, including over a half million whites. The group is diverse including some of the young whose status will certainly change as they mature, those who have taken vows of poverty (the religious), the migrant workers who have little chance of escaping poverty, and others. The poverty incidence for the whites was 36 percent and the blacks, 52 percent. Although their poverty is severe they comprise a small proportion of the South's total poor persons, 7 percent, thus will not be analyzed further in this report. Table 11 shows the number or poor and poverty rate by race for these non-elderly unrelated individuals in the eleven Southern states.

[5]Husband-wife families are classified by the Census as male-headed regardless of other factors, hence the vast majority of male-headed families are husband-wife families. In female-headed families there are no husbands present.

[6]Because of the relatively small numbers of Indians in the Census South (42,000 families) it is more difficult to make extensive regional generalizations about their poverty status. Over one-fourth of all Indian families within the United States reside in the Census South. Their poverty incidence is similar to that for Indians in the total U.S. But the rate for both is extremely high, reflecting the grave economic difficulties faced by Indians. Of Indian families in the Census South, 32 percent were poor; in urban areas, 21 percent; and in rural areas, about 40 percent. Spanish-Americans are discussed in Appendix A; the vast majority are included in the Tables with whites since that is their racial classification. families than the non-South's. Considering race and sex of the family head together, there were two major differences between the South and non-South. In the South a greater proportion, by far, of poor families were headed by black males (24 percent) than in the non-South (7 percent). A smaller proportion of Southern poor families were headed by white females than in the non-South (13 percent compared to 24 percent).

Families headed by white males make up the largest portion of poor family heads in the South, though relatively much less than in the total Southern population (46 percent compared to 76 percent[7]). However, this is not to down-play the fact that blacks make up a much greater share of the Southern poor than non-Southern. No family type is spared the impact of poverty.

Locational Aspects of Poverty in the South

Like the regional variation in the national poverty profile, within the South the incidence of poverty varies by residence and the distribution of the poor population is different from that of the total population.

The map on the inside of the front cover shows the variation among Southern counties in the percent of the population that was poor in 1970. The range is from a low of 4 percent in Henrico County, Virginia (Richmond suburbs) and Fairfax County, Virginia (Washington suburb) to a high of 58 percent for Jefferson County, Mississippi (100 percent rural). Within the South definite sub-regions with high incidence of poverty exist —most of the state of Mississippi; the coastal plains of the Carolinas and Georgia; the mountain counties of North Carolina, Virginia, and Tennessee; south Texas; substantial sections of Arkansas and Louisiana adjacent to the Mississippi river, but not confined to those locations; southern Alabama; and north Florida. In each of the eleven states a geographical concentration of counties with high poverty rates is apparent. These regions only to a limited degree can be characterized as rural areas.

Using counties as the units for the map tends to place more importance on area (land) than on population. The rates for many counties are high but many of these counties have few people. The central city counties, on the other hand, have lower rates of poverty than rural counties, by and large, but they have much more population. These counties containing the largest cities are mostly shaded yellow, but if the data were disaggregated for neighborhoods, sections of the cities where the poor were concentrated would fall into the heavier poverty ranges and would consequently be darker than yellow.

The map in the centerfold shows for Southern counties the proportion of the population that was rural. There is less of a pattern on the rural map than on the poverty map. The highest poverty incidence counties (reds) include counties from each of the various rural percent ranges. The explanation for this dissimilarity is found in the data on poverty rates by residence.

By residence the highest poverty rate in the South was in rural areas—nearly one-quarter of all families. The lowest rate was in the urban fringe—8 percent. The rate for the central cities was less than the regional rate and that for smaller towns about the same as the regional average.

The one-quarter poverty rate for all families living in rural areas is much lower than the extremely high poverty rates for individual counties—especially the darkest red—shown on the map. However, when the poverty incidence is examined according to both the residence and race of families, the maps are more understandable.

Source: Tables 4 and 5.

These data reveal that over half of black families in rural areas were poor. This percentage is in line with the extremely high poverty rates on the poverty map. In these areas there is also a high proportion of black residents. The map on the inside of the back cover shows for Southern counties the percent of the population that was black. There is a fairly high degree of correspondence between the black population map and the poverty map in the areas of darkest hues (reds and blues). There are several notable exceptions on the poverty map that are not heavily black—southern Texas (high percentages of Spanish-Americans) and the Appalachian counties (areas of poor whites).

Other comparisons between white and black families for other residence places show that black rates are three to four times higher than white rates in the same place. The least poor black residential group, the urban fringe, has a higher poverty rate than the most poor white residential group, rural. Blacks in every residential place have rates so much higher than whites that location alone is not a sufficient discriminator in describing poverty.

It was mentioned earlier that there was a smaller regional differential in poverty rates for female-headed families than male. Within the South this was also the case for urban-rural poverty rate differentials. The poverty rates for rural families headed by males were about twice those of urban areas. But for families headed by females the differential was less.

Though rural poverty rates are higher than urban ones for all groups, the urban poor, nevertheless, make up the greatest number of poor. Of all Southern families in 1970 more lived in urbanized areas compared to smaller urban places or rural areas. However, a greater percentage of the poor lived in rural areas than the total population, about the same percentage in smaller urban places, and relatively fewer, in urbanized areas.

However, the residence pattern of the poor was not the same for whites and blacks. Poor black families were somewhat less likely than poor white families to be rural residents.

Poor families headed by females were more concentrated in urban areas than families headed by poor males. At least two-thirds of female-headed poor families lived in urban places compared to less than half of similar families headed by males.

Over half of both white male and black male-headed poor families were rural residents. Seven out of ten poor families headed by black females and two out of three headed by white females were urban residents. Hence nearly opposite residence patterns exist for poor males and for poor females.

Some Variations in Poverty Across the Southern States

In the preceding discussion and in the remainder of this report the emphasis is on poverty in the eleven Southern states considered together. The same data for each of the individual states is available in the tables which follow each section. By and large the observations about the region are applicable to the states, but readers are encouraged to use the tables to verify this for the states in which they have an interest. Some important differences between the states will be touched upon briefly here.

The variation in poverty between the states is considerable. The poverty incidence for families varied from a high in Mississippi of three out of every ten to a low in Florida and Virginia of 12-13 percent (Table 10). The numbers of poor, depending on the size of the total population, were as high as over two million in Texas and over one million in Florida, in spite of relatively low poverty incidences.

The states vary considerably according to the population's urban and rural residence. Although a greater proportion of the poor in every state were rural residents than the total population, the magnitude of the rural percent depended on how urban or rural the state was (Table 7). In the highly urban states, Florida and Texas, only about three out of ten poor were rural residents. In the most rural states, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Arkansas, nearly two-thirds of the poor were rural residents. In those states that were neither heavily urban nor rural, the poor were divided more or less evenly between urban and rural areas. There is more diversity between the states regarding the residence than other aspects of the poor population.

The poverty incidence for blacks across the Southern states was always much higher than that for whites. For the region, the black poverty incidence was 3.5 times as great as for whites (41 percent to 12 percent). Among the states there was a wide racial disparity[8] in terms of family poverty. For the individual states black family poverty incidence was 2.5 to 4.3 times as great as white families. The disparity was greatest within South Carolina where black families were 4.3 times more likely to be poor than white families (Table 10). Four other states with greater disparity than the region were Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, and Mississippi. The states with the lowest disparity between the races were Tennessee and Texas but blacks were still 2.5 times more likely to be poor than whites.

Economic Development

These facts about location and the race and sex of the family head have implications for economic development activities. An overall economic improvement in the South is essential. Yet it will not necessarily change the relative poverty rates between the four family-head groups unless other types of activities are undertaken.[9] Economic development activity confined to specific areas will benefit groups selectively.

Rural development will have the most chance of affecting the economic future of male-headed families as opposed to female-headed ones. Whether the policies would favor one race over the other depends to a great degree on the particular areas chosen for development. If the areas were heavily white, benefits would cause a reduction in the white male-headed family poverty rate, the group already with the lowest rate. This would result in relatively worsening the comparison between white males and the three other family-head types. If the areas were heavily black, black male-headed [8]Statistically, racial disparity is measured by computing the ratio of black values to white values. Thus the ratio of the black poverty rate to the white poverty rate indicates a disparity between the races in the impact of poverty. A ratio of 1.0 indicates equivalent poverty rates for blacks and whites; a ratio of 2.0 that the black rate is twice the white rate and so on. For other discussions and uses see: Jack L. Bullard and Robert J. Smith, Community Conditions in Charlotte, 1970, the Charlotte-Mecklenburg Community Relations Committee, 1974, and Michael J. Flax, Blacks and Whites, An Experiment in Racial Indicators, The Urban Institute.

[9]The economic improvements in the decade of the sixties which resulted in the number of poor being reduced substantially, principally affected male-headed families. The number of families in poverty was reduced from 1959 to 1968 by over 50 percent for white male and black male-headed families, by 17 percent for white female-headed families, and was increased bq 34 percent for black female-headed families. U. S. Bureau of the Census, Current Population Reports, "Poverty in the United States: 1959 to 1968," Series P-60, No. 68, 1969, page 3.

families' poverty rate would drop. This would improve the relative position of blacks vis-a-vis whites in the South. It would also improve the poverty comparison of black male-headed families in the South with counterparts in the non-South (the group which had the greatest regional differential in poverty rates).

Rural economic development in heavily black areas would also improve the earning potential of black women. This would primarily benefit husband-wife, that is by census definition male-headed, families. Whatever benefits accrued to rural black female-headed families would not change the overall poverty rates of black female-headed families very much since they are so overwhelmingly urban residents.

Services or activities directed to poor female-headed families would be of most benefit if located within urban areas since most of these families live there. This includes such activities as family-type services, day care and other child-centered programs, job training, labor market outreach, and other supportive services.

CHAPTER II THE WORKING POOR

SUMMARY

1. In 1970 six out of ten poor family heads under age 65 in the South were working compared to five out of ten in the rest of the nation.
2. For all four race/sex groupings the percentage of poor who were working was greater in the South than in states outside the region. The greatest difference, however, was for poor black female family heads. Nearly twice as high a proportion of such women in the South were working as in the non-South.
3. Of Southern employed family heads, 54 percent of black females, 26 percent of black males, 18 percent of white females and six percent of white males did not earn enough to keep their families out of poverty.
4. In 1970 the industrial structure of the South was still more weighted toward low wage industries than the nation's. It had higher proportions of its labor force working in agriculture, mining, construction, nondurable manufacturing (especially in textiles), and personal services; and lower proportions in durable manufacturing, business services and other professional services.
5. Operatives in blue collar occupations formed the largest occupational group among the South's poor male family heads, nearly one-fourth. Together farmers and farm laborers accounted for one-fifth of poor male family-head employment.
6. Blue collar occupations together accounted for the employment of six out of ten of all poor male heads.
7. Almost half of Southern farm laborers and about one-quarter of Southern farm owners were in poverty. However, for blacks, the poverty rate of farm owners was nearly as high as for farm laborers, 58 percent compared to 65 percent.
8. Poor employed female family heads were more heavily concentrated in service occupations than in any other group. Fifty-eight percent worked either outside the home in such jobs as waitress, counter-worker, dishwasher, cleaner, nursing aide, maid, hairdresser, child care worker, and cook, or as private household workers. Seventy-one percent of poor black female heads were in such occupations.
9. One-fifth of employed poor female family heads worked in blue collar occupations, the same proportion as in white collar jobs.
10. Poverty rates for black female heads were double those for all women in sales and clerical and blue collar jobs, but more or less on a par for service type jobs.
11. Poverty rates for males in all occupational groups were higher in rural than urban areas, but for females there was very little difference by residence. One exception was female blue collar work in rural areas where poverty rates were lower than for similarly employed women in urban areas.
12. With the erosion of the farming population over the past two decades rural poverty is no longer confined to those involved in agriculture. The rural poor are very substantially working in blue collar jobs of various sorts.
13. As a factor in reduced earnings, part-time work among the working poor is not as important as a short work year. Only a little over half of the working poor in the South were employed a full year.
14. Southerners have received less formal education than the nation's population as a whole. Among the working-age family heads (25 to 64 years) in the South, slightly less than half have graduated from high school compared to 57 percent in the nation. As for the Southern poor, only one in five has finished high school and nearly half have not even attended high school.
15. By race and sex of family heads the education of the poor varies considerably. Over one-third of poor white women had high school education or more; of white males, over one-fifth; of black females over one-sixth; and of black males only one-tenth.
16. Of family heads who were high school graduates, a wide variation in poverty rates prevailed—over half of black females were poor compared with only four percent of white males. For those poor heads who were college graduates, poverty rates for males were quite low, but for females much higher, indicating the persistence of sex rather than race discrimination among college graduates.
17. Union membership in the eleven Southern states in 1970 numbered 2.4 million, or 15 percent of the non-agricultural work force, compared to 28 percent for the United States as a whole.
18. The earnings differential between unionized and non-unionized workers was greater in the South than in the rest of the nation, with unionized workers earning considerably more than their non-unionized counterparts.

Of the heads of poor families in the South in 1970 who could reasonably be expected to work—those under 65 years—the large majority, six out of ten were working. Of the non-elderly family heads who were not employed some were disabled, in school, the unemployed seeking work, raising young children, or finally, either "discouraged" workers or otherwise disaffected from the labor market.

The South had a greater concentration of the nation's working poor[1] 44 percent, than it had of all poor persons, 38 percent. This resulted in higher proportions of working poor, among all poor in the South than in the non-South—61 percent compared to 50 percent. For all four race/sex groupings the percentage who were working poor was also greater in the South than in the non-South.

Working Poor as a Percent of Poor Family Heads Under 65 Years, 1970

| | Non-South | South |
|---|---|---|
| All family heads | 50% | 61% |
| White male | 66 | 67 |
| White female | 31 | 39 |
| Black male | 58 | 74 |
| Black female | 25 | 49 |

Source: Table 12.

The difference between the South and the non-South in the proportion of poor who were working was greatest for black female heads—nearly twice as great a proportion in the South as in the non-South. The lower proportion for female heads in the non-South was probably due in part to the more liberal public assistance eligibility requirements outside the South where female heads are less likely to have to resort to poorly paid work. The regional differentials also probably indicate less availability and less likelihood of coverage by other kinds of income assistance programs.

The situation of Southern poor family heads with respect to employment is more forcefully shown by their poverty rates. For employed family heads in the South over half of black women, about one-fourth of black men, about one-fifth of white women, and one-twentieth of white men did not earn enough to keep their families out of poverty. The higher incidence of poverty among employed blacks and particularly among black females—suggests the degree to which traditional employment patterns in the South have relegated blacks to the most menial and lowest paying jobs. These data also show that employed heads had proportionally lower poverty rates than all family heads. The proportional difference for the black female heads was the least. The persistence of poverty among this group in spite of employment indicates the degree to which their jobs paid sub-poverty wages.

Poverty Rates for Families with Heads Under 65 in the South, 1970

| | All Heads | Employed Heads |
|---|---|---|
| White males | 10% | 6% |
| White females | 30 | 18 |
| Black males | 33 | 26 |
| Black females | 64 | 54 |

Source: Tables 3 and 13.

In 1970 among poor families headed by males there were 139,000 with both husband and wife employed. Most of these were black—79,000—which was twenty-two percent of all poor black husband-wife families. In still another way this demonstrates the poorer position of blacks in the South. The 40,000 white families in similar circumstances accounted for fewer—nine percent—of poor white husband-wife families.[2]

Factors relevant to the poverty of the employed in the South include the nature of the industrial and wage structure in the region compared to the nation, the occupational distribution for poor family heads, and the persistence of underemployment.

Industrial Structure of the South

The industrial structure of the South compared to the United States is characterized by higher proportions of industries which have lower earnings, seasonal and other irregular work periods, less capital investment, more intensive use of labor, and less technological innovation. The industries of which the South had higher proportions than the nation in 1970 included the primary sector—agriculture and mining, construction, nondurable manufacturing, and personal services. The South also had slightly higher proportions of federal public administration. The region's proportion of industries which are considered to have higher requirements for skilled and/or educated manpower are lower than the nation as a whole. These industries included durable manufacturing; finance, insurance, and real estate (F.I.R.E.); business services; and other professional services (see Table 14). The region also had a slightly lower proportion in state and local public administration.

With respect to manufacturing it is well known that the South has larger proportions of the textile and fabricated textile industries, and to a lesser extent the furniture and wood products industries. In the South over six percent of the labor force was in the textile industries compared to about three percent for the nation. Employment in the region in furniture and wood products industries was somewhat greater than in the nation, but in other durable manufacturing was much less than in the nation. Whereas the entire country had over 14 percent of employment in the durable sectors which include primary and fabricated metals, machinery, and motor vehicle manufacturing, the South had less than nine percent in these sectors.

[1]Working poor are those poor persons whose income in 1969 was below the poverty level and who were employed (full or part-time) at the time of the 1970 Census.
[2]Computed from Detailed Characteristics, State volumes, Table 209.

In the service sector, the South, compared to the nation, had greater proportions of its labor force in household oriented services. Personal services (hotels and other lodging places, laundries, dry cleaners, barber and beauty shops, shoe repair) and private households employed relatively more persons in the South. The services which are primarily, but not exclusively, for businesses (F.I.R.E.; business services including advertising, research, management, and programming services; and other professional services, including legal, engineering, and accounting services) were less well represented in the region. The household-oriented services are usually performed by the least skilled of the labor force and the business-oriented services by highly trained personnel. But the business type services, also, have needs which include many white collar support personnel. These white collar workers are not particularly well-paid or highly skilled, but usually must be high school graduates. The white collar industries therefore, require both the highly paid professional and many less educated workers, but those with high school diplomas.

Relatively fewer persons are employed in the various sectors delivering health care in the South compared with the nation. The region also had a somewhat smaller percentage of its labor force in educational services than the nation.

The industrial mix in the South is more heavily influenced by low wage industries, and consequently earnings levels are lower than those in the nation. The data used in this report did not report the industry of poor employed persons. But examining the proportions of earners with incomes less than $4,000 annually, according to industry, indicates those industries where the officially classified poor would be concentrated. For men, higher proportions of low earners than of all earners were found in agriculture, wholesale and retail trade, construction, and personal services. For women the proportions of low earners were highest in personal service and wholesale and retail trade (see Table 15).

As the South has moved away from its former agricultural employment emphasis, the former agricultural workers have moved into other jobs. Manufacturing has been a major growth sector in the South, and its rate of growth has been higher in non-metropolitan than in metropolitan areas.[3] However, many of the manufacturing jobs have been low paying (the textile and apparel sectors, especially) and in sectors in which unionization is slight. Beyond the creation of more jobs in the goods producing sector are opportunities to create jobs in sectors which serve human needs. Unmet needs include a shortage of adequate housing, a shortage and maldistribution of health resources and facilities, and the still lower high school completion rate of black youths. Public commitment to meeting these needs could create jobs in the construction, health, and educational sectors for both higher skilled and/or educated workers and low skilled ones (such as service workers in hospitals) and also improve the circumstances of those who are served.

Occupations of Poor Male Family Heads

Poor employed male family heads in the South were most likely to work either in farming or blue collar occupations. This is in contrast to all (i.e., including non-poor) employed male family heads who were employed mostly in white collar and blue collar occupations. Operatives (including transport operatives) formed the largest occupational group among the South's poor male family heads, nearly one-fourth. Together farmers and farm laborers accounted for one-fifth of poor male family head employment. Craftsmen accounted for 18 percent and non-farm laborers, 16 percent. Altogether the blue collar occupations accounted for six out of ten employed poor males in the South (See Tables 16, 17, and 18).

Black male family heads when compared with all male family heads were less likely to have had a white collar occupation (13 percent compared to 40 percent) and more likely to have had a laboring or operative occupation (49 percent compared to 25 percent). Fewer blacks, relatively, were employed in craft jobs and more in service jobs. The poor among black male family heads were even less likely to have had white collar jobs or craft jobs. They were most likely to have had laboring jobs. A higher percentage of poor black males (one-fifth), than of all black males were employed in farming (as owners or farm laborers).

Though farming occupations (which include both farm owners and farm laborers) employed relatively few male family heads, the poverty rates for these occupations were the highest. Almost half of farm laborers and about one-quarter of owners were in poverty. As for non-farm laborers, nearly one-quarter were poor. This occupational group, whose primary requirement is physical strength, worked in all industries and held such jobs as garbage collector, construction laborer, freight and material handler, lumberman, warehouseman, vehicle washer, stock handler. Otherwise, poverty rates in excess of 10 percent were registered for transport equipment operatives, service workers, and operatives. The professionals, technical and managerial, clerical and sales workers, and craftsmen groups had relatively low poverty rates.

Sixty-five percent of black male farm laborers were poor, the highest poverty rate for any male occupation group. Unlike the farmer poverty rate for all males, which was about half that of farm laborers, the farmer poverty rate for black males (58 percent) was close to that for farm laborers. Black male farm owners, then, were little better off than farm laborers. The next highest poverty rate for black males was among non-farm laborers, 32 percent. The poverty rates for the other blue collar and service occupations were at least one in five.

Occupations of Poor Female Family Heads

Poor employed female heads were more heavily concentrated in service occupations than in any other group. Fifty-eight percent worked either outside the home in such jobs as waitress, counter worker, dishwasher, cleaner, nursing aide, maid, hairdresser, child care worker, and cook, or as private household workers. The next largest proportion of poor—one-fifth—were blue collar workers in such occupations as sewer, stitcher, spinner, textile operative, checker, examiner, packer, wrapper, and laundry and dry cleaning operative. A similar proportion (one-fifth) worked in white collar occupations, mostly as sales and clerical persons, but some as professional and technical managers. In contrast, of all female heads four out of ten were in white collar jobs; but about the same proportion in blue collar work as the poor (Tables 19, 20 and 21).

Employment among all black female family heads was predominantly in service occupations, 62 percent, split about evenly between private households and non-household employment. This was much greater than that for all female heads (33 percent). The percentage in white collar occupations for black females was 16 percent compared with 43 percent for all female heads. Among poor black female heads the proportion who had service jobs was still greater than among all black females, 71 percent, with 40 percent in households.

Poverty rates for women of all races were especially severe for service workers, both non-household and household (45 and 66 percent respectively), and also for blue collar occupations (27 percent). As with all comparisons made between the sexes, women had higher poverty rates than men for the same occupations (see Tables 16 and 19). The poverty rates among black females in service occupations were only slightly higher than those among all females. But for white collar and blue collar occupations black female poverty rates were much higher.

The similarity in poverty rates for black and all female heads in service occupations probably implies less disparity in wage treatment between the races. Since these jobs are low wage, whoever holds them, black or white, is probably poor. On the other hand, blue and white collar employment pay higher wages and have a wider range than service jobs. Therefore the dissimilarity in poverty rates in these occupations implies a greater dissimilarity in wages with black women holding more of the lower paid jobs.

The occupational segregation of blacks and women in large part explains their much higher poverty rates. Employment opportunities in the South should improve as a wider variety of industry locates in the region. But without an attack on race and sex discrimination the usual pattern of white men increasing their advantage will continue. It is not enough to provide blacks and women with what is left over after white men have "creamed" the job market. Employment stimulation, coupled with strong anti-discrimination measures should be undertaken. Various manpower and training programs are also appropriate for blacks and women.

Urban and Rural Differences

An examination of poverty rates according to urban and rural residence for male and female heads showed once again that residence makes little difference in the poverty situation of the female head. Male rates for all occupational groups appear higher in rural than urban areas but females showed much smaller differences (Table 22). An exception to this were blue collar poverty rates for female heads which were lower in rural areas. This may be due to the prevalence of textile and apparel factories in rural areas compared to even lower-paid manufacturing jobs in urban areas.

Over the last two decades the farming population has been eroded drastically in every southern state (Table 23). Thus as Table 22 shows, rural poverty is not confined to the farming population. The rural poor are very substantially working in blue collar work of various sorts, although the farming occupations have very high poverty rates. For male heads in rural areas non-farm laborers had the second highest poverty rate, next to farm laborers, with farmers slightly less subject to poverty than non-farm laborers.

Full-time and Full-year Employment

Since earnings are related to time worked as well as to rates of pay, underemployment, lack of full-time and/or full-year employment can seriously reduce workers' earnings. Three-quarters of poor employed family heads worked full-time, 35 hours or more a week. This varied according to the race and sex of the head, but only black women were significantly below the three-quarter figure, a fact that was no doubt due to their heavy concentration in service jobs where work weeks are short. (Nationally the work week for household domestic workers averaged 29 hours in 1974.[4])

A short work-year, less than 50-52 weeks, accounted substantially for the reduced earnings of the employed poor. Slightly over half of the working poor in the South were employed a full year, with a higher percentage of males so employed. The rate for black males was similar to that for all males, but a higher percentage of black females than all females worked a full year.

Reduced weeks of work experienced by the poor are related to the industries of their employment, such as farming, household service, construction and other outdoor laboring jobs, which employed many of the poor in these states. Among the total civilian labor force (poor and non-poor) in the nation who worked in 1970 nearly three-quarters of males and just over one-half of females worked the full year. Nationally, industries in which a smaller proportion of labor forces worked 50-52 weeks included construction, personal services (including private households), entertainment and recreation, professional and related services, retail trade, and agriculture.[5] These were the same industries, with the exception of professional and related services, that had higher than average proportions of low earners (see Table 15). Three of those industries (construction, personal service, and agriculture) employed relatively more of the South's labor force than of the nation's (Table 14). The standard eight-hour day, 52-week year is not a common feature of these industries—construction and recreation have seasonal fluctuation; in retailing, the longer day and seasonal fluctuations necessitate variable manning schedules; restaurant employment depends on serving schedules; and private household work is at the whim of employers who can cancel with no penalty to them.

In addition to the institutionalized irregular scheduling in some industries, workers are laid off in others when the work force exceeds the work load. This is particularly true for production workers in manufacturing. Voluntary resignations from jobs and subsequent unemployment are contributing factors to shorter work years, but irregularities in work schedules are more significant causes of poverty among the work force. Those with low-paying jobs are often employed in sectors where employment is not steady over the year.

Even working the full year, however, does not guarantee freedom from poverty. Six percent of all Southern males who were employed the full year were poor, 21 percent of all females, 21 percent of black males, and 47 percent of black females.[6] A minimum wage job ($1.60 per hour in 1969) would have earned a worker $3328 per year for 40 hours for 52 weeks, about $400 under the poverty line for a family of four. Any full-time, full-year job paying less than $1.80 per hour would have resulted in a poverty income for a family of four in 1969.

Since so many Southern working poor lack full-year work, income supplementation programs, if improved and extended, could keep more of these families out of poverty. The unemployment insurance programs need to be expanded in coverage and benefits. AFDC (Aid to Families with Dependent Children) programs for families with an unemployed father (AFDC-UF) as well as general assistance supplementation programs for low income working families, such as many Northern states have, are seriously needed in Southern states. None has an AFDC-UF program. A few have general assistance programs; all of them very modest.

Since jobs that pay wages above the poverty level are not universally available, investment in human resources (usually education and training) has been advocated as a way to improve the labor supply and therefore create the necessary human capital to upgrade employment opportunities. But education is not necessarily a panacea.

Education and the Poor

In the quest for a higher paying job many have resorted to the credentials race. At a time when employers are raising hiring requirements, often to levels that are unnecessary for the performance of the work, the acquisition of credentials by those in the labor market is frequently an over-response to employer demands.[7] But in an atmosphere of rising educational requirements for jobs, those without credentials can suffer a competitive disadvantage.

[7] An idea developed by Lester Thurow, "Education and Economic Equality" in The Public Interest, No. 28, Summer, 1972.

Southerners have received less formal education than the nation's population as a whole.[8] Among working-age family heads (25 to 64 years) in the South slightly less than half have graduated from high school compared with 57 percent in the nation. The Southern poor are particularly handicapped in terms of achieved education. Only one in five has finished high school and nearly half have not even attended high school.

Source: Computed from 4th Count Tapes.

According to race and sex of the family head, the education of the poor varies considerably. Over one-third of poor white women had high school diplomas or more education; of white males, over one-fifth; of black females, over one-sixth; and of black males, only one-tenth. Sixty percent of poor black males had not even attended high school and 46 percent of poor white males had not. While poor women of both races have higher rates of high school attendance than poor men, poor black females were exceeded in completion of high school by poor white males (Table 26).

Though a higher percentage of poor white women had completed more years of education, their poverty rates were worse than the poorest educated group (black males). And black females' poverty rates were high in spite of their having more education than black men (Table 27).

Of family heads who were high school graduates over half of black females were poor, compared with only four percent of white males. Black male graduates had substantially higher poverty rates than white males, and white women higher rates than black males. These poverty rate differences cannot be totally attributed to qualitative differences in education, since males and females of the same race were usually educated in the same schools.

Among college graduates, the poverty rates for both black and white male family heads were similar and low, and for both black and white women were also similar, but over four times higher than for males. Poverty rates for college graduates indicate less racial discrimination, but far more sex discrimination (Table 27).

Lack of education is frequently cited as a cause of rural poverty. In the South the rural poor population has completed less years of schooling than the urban poor. Over half—55 percent—of rural poor family heads 25-64 years old have never attended high school compared to 38 percent of urban poor heads; 14 percent of rural heads completed high school or more compared with 25 percent of urban poor heads (Table 28).

| High school graduate | 7 | 8 |

Source: Table 29.

However, although rural poverty rates always exceeded urban poverty rates for the various completed education groups, the differences were not as great as between various race and sex groups. For those with no high school the comparison of poverty incidence betweeen rural and urban heads was 27 percent to 35 percent. The same comparison by race and sex of head show white males with a 21 percent poverty rate and black females, 70 percent. These relationships are also true for the other educational-group comparisons (Tables 27 and 29). In general race and sex of the head are more potent indicators of poverty than residence among the various achieved education groups.

Clearly just more education is not enough to combat poverty. Among the less well-educated are many who are not poor. For instance, 80 percent of white males who did not attend high school are not poor. The other demographic groups were not so fortunate, however. Educational credentials are useful where realistically applied and if they are not overlaid by race and sex discrimination. But as we have seen, the black, the female, and, most particularly, the black female receive heavy penalties, often in spite of having acquired the necessary credentials.

[8]The educational disparity between the South and the rest of the nation has been decreasing since younger Southerners have received more education than their elders. The distribution of years of school completed for the age group 25-29 in 1972, in contrast to that above for all working aged family heads, shows that the South compares much more favorably to the rest of the nation.

In addition to the problems of discrimination which interfere with the optimum allocation of jobs, the investment in human resources approach can create a supply of workers that exceeds demand. A more fundamental criticism, however, is that this approach rewards those with formal credentials—whether job related or not—at the expense of those without such credentials. A more humane allocation of wages recognizes the merit in the contribution of all jobs and puts a wage floor under them. This would have the virtue of not unrealistically raising job expectations when, in our economy, unpleasant or even demeaning jobs, with little advancement opportunity will certainly continue. In the absence of a governmental sponsored wage floor for all work, labor unions have been the best protection for those workers who are not in the professional and managerial classes.

Union Membership in the South

Traditionally, those workers who neither seek nor are required to have educational credentials, use collective action to improve their economic position. While unions are increasingly common in white collar work, their impact historically has been among non-manufacturing crafts and manufacturing production workers. The South as a region has lagged behind the rest of the nation in union membership and consequently in collective bargaining. Ten Southern states have right-to-work laws (all except Louisiana). This climate against organizing and opposition from vested interests has inhibited many an organizing drive; and, as a result, the blue collar workers are deprived of what could be a potent protector against the poverty-producing circumstance of their work.

In the South the proportion of wage and salaried workers who are union members is a little over half that of the United States as a whole. Union membership in the 11 Southern states in 1970 numbered 2.4 million, or 15 percent of the non-agricultural work force, compared with 28 percent for the United States (Table 30). Even in those industries that traditionally are highly unionized, the South has a lower rate of union membership. The construction industry in the South is 22 percent unionized compared with 39 percent in the nation; durable manufacturing and nondurable manufacturing respectively are 25 percent and 17 percent unionized in the South, compared with 37 percent and 29 percent for the United States. The nondurable manufacturing unionization proportion is especially low in the South because the region has a disproportionately high share of the textile industry, which nationally is the least unionized of all manufacturing.

Even though the South is relatively less organized, the unionized employees have higher median earnings than their non-unionized counterparts. In fact, the earnings differential between union and non-union employees is greater in the South than in any other region for males and for females greater than the Northeast but slightly below the North Central and the West.

Median Earnings of Union and Non-union Workers and Ratio of Union to Non-union Workers' Earnings*

| Males | $8,053 | $5,839 | 1.38 |
| Females | 4,483 | 2,601 | 1.72 |

| Males | 8,385 | 7,353 | 1.14 |
| Females | 4,422 | 3,160 | 1.41 |

*U. S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, Selected Earnings and Demographic Characteristics of Union Members, 1970, Report 417, 1972, Table 9.

The Southern female differential between union and non-union earnings is greater than males. Since many females are in manufacturing, there is potential for altering their financial situation through unionization.

The data also show that for both males and females in the South who are unionized the median earnings are only slightly lower than their Northeast counterparts. Thus the Southern labor force stands to gain more from unionization than other regions of the nation.

DATA SOURCE: Rural population data from: Lee, Everett S.; Levin, Martin L.; Pendleton, William W.; and Postma, Patricia D.; Urban Growth Patterns Research Group; Demographic Profiles of the United States, Vol. V, VI, VII, ORNL-HUD-24, Oak Ridge National Laboratory, February 1972. Boundaries of SMSA's and central cities and SMSA population from United States Maps, GE—50, No. 40, "Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas: 1970."

RURAL POPULATION: The population living in places smaller than 2,500 persons (that are not part of urbanized areas) or in the open country. Persons not living in rural areas are the urban population.

STANDARD METROPOLITAN STATISTICAL AREAS (SMSA'S): An SMSA consists of a county or groups of counties containing at least one city of 50,000 or more plus adjacent counties which are metropolitan in character and socially and economically integrated with the central city.

CENTRAL CITY: The largest city and additional cities, if they meet a population criteria, within the SMSA are central cities.

VIRGINIA: The 29 independent cities not shown on the map have been combined with adjoining counties.

CHAPTER III POOR SOUTHERN FAMILIES WITH CHILDREN

SUMMARY

1. Forty-one percent of all Southern poor were children compared to 36 percent in the rest of the nation. The poverty incidence for children in the eleven states was one in four.
2. Two-thirds of poor white children were living with both parents, but less than half of poor black children were similarly situated since female-headed families were more prevalent among blacks than whites.
3. The proportion of Southern poor black families with children in the home was over three-quarters; among whites, it was slightly more than one half.
4. White male-headed families with children had lower poverty rates than similarly headed families without children, a situation in direct contrast to that among female-headed families of both races and among black male-headed families. The poverty incidence for both white and black female-headed families increased almost two-fold with the presence of children.
5. Poverty incidence among male headed-families with children was nearly twice as high in rural areas as in urban areas. For female-headed families with children the difference by residence was not nearly so dramatic.
6. Only six percent of Southern families received public assistance in 1970, slightly over 750,000; the average annual benefit was $875 or one-quarter of the poverty level for a female-headed family of four.
7. Only one in seven poor families in the South were raised from poverty by public assistance.
8. The total income from public assistance received by families in the eleven state South was $669 million in 1969, 75 percent of which came from the federal government.
9. Of poor families with a female head and young children in the home (248,000), over half of the female heads were working in 1970 in the South. Yet the poverty incidence for these families was not substantially different from that for all welfare recipient families—51 percent compared to 55 percent.
10. For white female-headed families with young children the poverty incidence for those with an employed head was half that of those without an employed head; for blacks the reduction in poverty rate for working was much less—from 86 percent to 66 percent.
11. The income needed to fill the gap between the income of the poor and the poverty line was $4.1 billion before assistance in 1970. Federal and state payments together amounted to only 16.5 percent of this amount.

Poverty bears particularly heavy on children of the region. Forty-one percent of all Southern poor persons were children compared to 36 percent in the rest of the nation. This amounted to 4.2 million children, 2.3. million black and 1.9 million white, living in poor Southern families. In two Southern states, South Carolina and Mississippi, the proportion of children of the state's poor was as high as 45 percent (Table 31). The poverty incidence for children in the Southern region was one in four—a rate higher than that for all Southern persons.

For the four race/sex family head groups, poor families with children had the same residential patterns as all poor families (Tables 9 and 32). The difference in poverty incidence between urban and rural areas was similar to that for all poor families as discussed in Chapter I. The male-headed family with children was about twice as likely to be poor if living in a rural area, but for the female-headed family with children the difference was much less.

Family Composition

Most of the poor white children—two-thirds—were living with both of their parents, but less than half of poor black children were similarly situated.

| Children Living in Poor Families in the South, 1970 | White | Black |
|---|---|---|
| With both parents | 68% | 47% |
| Without both | 32 | 53 |
| | 100% | 100% |
| Total, millions | 1.9 | 2.3 |

Source: Computed from 4th Count Tapes.

This difference between black and white children is consistent with the fact that among all poor families with children relatively more white than black families were headed by males (e.g., were husband-wife families)—70 percent compared to 55 percent.[1] Still another difference between white and black families was in the proportion of all poor families who had children living in the home. Among blacks the figure was over three-quarters; among whites, slightly more than one half. Differences in the presence of children and differences in the sex of the family head resulted in the family composition below.

Since the family without children was so much less prevalent among blacks than whites the foregoing figures suggest that many poor black adults (elderly and non-elderly) may be living in families where there also are young children rather than in separate families. These data indicate nothing about the presence of other relatives in the family but data from the nationwide Survey of Economic Opportunity about the poor[2] shed some light. Among male-headed poor families only 8 percent of white but 22 percent of black had children and other relatives (in addition to wives) living in the home. Among female-headed families the difference between the races was less but 20 percent of black families compared to 13 percent of white had both children and other relatives in the home. The survey also revealed that in female-headed families with children only 19 percent of white and 28 percent of black had persons other than children in the home.

The OEO family composition data highlight some problems in terms of aiding the poor. Since most poor black families contain children the work potential of mothers is reduced. Thus if mothers are to work, public child care programs must be expanded. Moreover, current public assistance programs are almost exclusively in aid to children. Therefore, potentially over three-quarters of black and over half of poor white families could be reached by this program alone if eligibility were liberalized and extended to male-headed families. Most of the male heads were working poor (Chapter II) and their poverty was usually due to low wages and/or underemployment.

Poverty Incidence and Family Composition

As between families with children and those without, the incidence of poverty was higher for those with children in three of the four race/sex groups of family heads. White male-headed families with children had lower poverty rates than similarly headed families without children, a situation in direct contrast to that among female-headed families of both races and among black male-headed families.

The reasons for this can partly be inferred from the family composition and labor market activity of the groups. Male-headed families without children include a large proportion of elderly whose incomes are relatively low. Male-headed families with children are overwhelmingly non-elderly, employed, and have wives present who are potential workers. White male-headed families in this situation have the best chances for high income. The white male can earn more than black men and all women and his chance for job and earnings mobility over his working life is greater. The black male-headed family has less chance for earning as much as his white counterpart; the male is more subject to underemployment, unemployment, a lower-paid job, and less lifetime job mobility. His wife, if she works, cannot expect earnings as high as any of the other groups. More of these black male-headed families also have other relatives in the family to support than do white families

The poverty incidence for both white and black female-headed families increased nearly two-fold with the presence of children. Since these families usually have no other adults present, the brunt of the financial responsibility falls on the mother alone. Four out of ten black female heads without children in the home are poor. The comparable families with children are even more subject to poverty—seven out of ten. White female heads without children are less often poor than their black counterparts, but one-fifth of them are poor. The employment of all women is largely in occupations and industries which are relatively low wage and therefore not adequate to the task of supporting a family. Many of the "female-type" jobs cannot support one person, much less a family. The continued occupational discrimination against women, and especially black women, is a barrier which must be overcome if poverty among female-headed families is to be substantially reduced.

Working Mothers with Young Children

Too often those who are anxious to reduce welfare rolls stress the potential employability of the family heads. Since most of these families are poor, putting the family head to work is frequently claimed to improve their economic circumstances.

In 1970, of the 395,000 female-headed families with children under six years, nearly six out of ten were working and of the 248,000 poor families, nearly five out of ten.[3] Thus, this group, far from being unemployable, was already substantially employed. Their problem is the inadequacy of the level and duration of the jobs. Perhaps too frequently strict criteria for acceptance for welfare keeps benefits from those who should have them.

Since these data do not distinguish between those mothers who were working and receiving welfare and those who were only working the extent of combinations of work and welfare are not available. As already noted, however, work is no guarantee that one will not be poor. Among all female-headed families with young children, the poverty incidence for those with an employed head was not substantially different from that for all welfare recipients. Over half of these families with an employed head were poor compared to 55 percent[4] of public assistance recipient families. This is also true for whites and blacks — for whites 35 percent of these families with an employed mother were poor compared to 43 percent of all white welfare families; for blacks the comparison was 66 percent for employed and 69 percent for welfare families.[5]

Source: Table 35.

For those not in the labor force (which includes welfare recipients as well as those neither receiving welfare nor working) poverty rates were even higher — 71 percent for white female heads and 86 percent for blacks.

Working does not reduce a black working mother's chances of getting out of poverty as much as it does a white's. For working white female heads with young children the chance of being poor is half that of those not in the labor force. For black female heads the difference in poverty rates between those in the labor force and those who are not is only one-third lower. As a matter of fact the black working mother has a poverty rate almost as high as the white non-working mother — 66 percent compared to 71 percent (Table 35).

The high poverty rates for the working mothers of young children suggests an inadequacy in the work incentive features of the AFDC program. The program allows recipients to keep $30.00 from their earnings, work-related expenses, and one-third of the rest of their earnings per month. Since the employment of poor women is practically always in low-wage jobs and industries, especially service type, the "$30.00 plus one-third" does not yield a great amount. This, coupled with an already low grant relative to need, often results in a sub-poverty level income. Alteration of the program to allow a higher proportion of earnings to be retained or to provide a sliding scale percentage of earnings to be retained would obviously be a more viable incentive.[6]

Most female-headed families with young children, whatever their labor force status or race were poor.[7] Neither present public assistance programs nor earnings were sufficient to prevent this. If an objective of public policy really is to reduce poverty among female-headed families, more vigorous and better financed income maintenance programs will be needed for a long time. For the truth is, despite pious rhetoric about the work ethic, neither the society nor the economy is changing fast enough to permit economic self-sufficiency for this group in the foreseeable future.

Public Assistance to Families with Children

Most public assistance is for children under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program (other assistance is given the elderly, blind, and disabled). In the discussion of data which follows it was not possible to disaggregate the various programs, but of the total, the aid to children represents the largest part — about 70 percent of the total aid.

Relatively few Southern families — six percent — received public assistance in 1969, or in absolute numbers, slightly over three-quarters of a million. Of this

[6]Other inequities of the program are that the states determine the allowable work related expenses (the South has a history of toughness in interpretations of other features) but more importantly the one-third retention of earnings amounts to a 67 percent tax rate, a rate equivalent to that for other taxpayers earning above $140,000. total more were whites than blacks and more were urban dwellers than rural dwellers. The rate of receipt, however, was higher for blacks — 17 percent compared to four percent and for rural families — seven percent compared to five percent (Table 36). It should be remembered, of course, that the poverty rate among black families was 41 percent compared to 12 percent among whites and uniformly higher in rural areas than in urban areas. Thus a minority of the poor receive aid. Of those families who were poor before the receipt of the aid, less than one-third, 31 percent, received public assistance. For poor black families the proportion receiving aid was 37 percent, yet of the main eligible group — female-headed families with children — 70 percent were poor. For poor white families 27 percent received aid yet 37 percent of white female-headed families with children were poor (Table 37).

Of these families who received aid more remained poor than were raised out of poverty as a result of the aid. Of all recipient families in the region, 55 percent were still below the poverty line. This proportion for black families was 69 percent, and for whites, 43 percent. The difference between rural and urban families still in poverty was less extreme, 61 percent as compared with 51 percent (Table 38).

The meagerness of benefits guarantees such results. The Southern average annual income received from public assistance in 1969 was $875 per recipient family or one-quarter of the poverty level for a female headed family of four. The average benefit for Southern whites was $845, and for blacks $908. The urban average was $878 and the rural, $870 (Table 39).

Of all of the before-aid-poor only one in seven were raised out of poverty by public assistance. White families were more often benefited than black families, 15 percent compared with 12 percent; and a higher percentage of urban families than rural, 16 percent compared with 12 percent (Table 40). The relative benefit to whites and urban dwellers was due not to the size of the benefit as shown by the above averages, but rather to the greater reliability of other income sources.

The welfare system of the South, of course, does not even pretend to eliminate poverty. State defined "need levels" are all lower than poverty levels and in most states maximum payments are far lower than need levels.[8]

The Dollars and Cents of Poverty

The Southern states pay out of their own revenue relatively small amounts for public assistance. Under matching provisions, the federal government's share is about three-quarters of the total public assistance bill.[9] The federal government's share is greater for low per capita income states; hence it pays a higher share of Southern states' welfare budgets than those of other states. The total income from public assistance received by families in the 11 states was $669 million in 1969. Thus the states, from state revenue sources, paid approximately $167 million and the federal government, the remaining three-quarters. Not unexpectedly among Southern states the federal government paid the highest share in Mississippi and the lowest in Virginia.[10]

The total contribution of public assistance toward relieving family poverty is meager. In the 11 states in 1969 the aggregate income deficit of before-aid-poor families, the income needed to fill the gap between the income of the poor and the poverty line, was $4.1 billion. Federal and states' payments of $669 million amounted to only 16.5 percent of the pre-aid gap. For families, public assistance filled the smallest gap in South Carolina, less than 10 percent of the aggregate need (see Table 41). The states that did the most, in combination with the federal government, (though still very little) were Georgia and Louisiana, where aggregate aid represented one-fifth of the aggregate income need.

The aggregate income deficit after aid for both families and for individuals for the South amounted to $4.9 billion in 1969. The total unmet family needs (to get up to the poverty level) were $3.4 billion ($4.1 billion less $669 million from public assistance) and individual needs were $1.5 billion (see Table 42). For the 10.3 million poor Southerners this averages out to a deficit of $476 per poor person.

Chapter IV The Elderly Poor in the South

SUMMARY

1. One-quarter of white families headed by an elderly person were poor and over half of similar black families. Of the elderly unattached to families, 50 percent of whites and 70 percent of blacks were poor. Thus while the South has less of an elderly poor population relative to other age groups, the poverty rates for the elderly are especially high.
2. A higher proportion of the aged population lived in rural areas than was true of the population as a whole. This is so because rural out-migration has been much more pronounced among younger people. Of poor families headed by an older person six out of ten white, compared to five out of ten black, lived in rural areas. On the other hand, the poor elderly person unattached to a family is much more likely to be an urban resident than is an elderly family head. Of elderly poor white individuals living outside the family, six out of ten were urban residents, and of blacks, two out of three.
3. Seventy-two percent of the South's aged received Social Security payments compared to 76 percent nationwide in 1969. In the South 75 percent of elderly whites were on Social Security; 64 percent of elderly blacks. A major reason for the difference between the races is that elderly blacks were so heavily concentrated in jobs that only over the past two decades have come under the Social Security Act — domestic work and farm labor.
4. Florida is the only Southern state that had a higher proportion of elderly receiving Social Security than the national average, a fact that can probably be credited to that state's unique position as a haven for retired, mostly non-poor whites from outside the South. Elderly blacks in Florida, for example, do not fare nearly so well. They receive benefits lower than the regional average.
5. Not only do fewer of the South's elderly persons receive benefits, but the average benefit is lower than the nation's since Southerners on the average have earned less.
6. Over one-third of Southern Social Security recipients remained poor. Black recipients were especially impoverished in Mississippi, Arkansas, and South Carolina where at least two-thirds were poor.
7. Nine percent of the white elderly and 23 percent of the black elderly in the South were poor and yet did not receive Social Security benefits. However, improvement in this situation should come if Supplemental Security Income programs are properly implemented.

Elderly[1] poor persons make up a smaller proportion of the South's poor than of the non-South's poor. Data in Chapter I show that of the South's poor, 17 percent are elderly and of the non-South's poor, 22 percent. The percentage of elderly poor living in families is about the same for the South and the non-South (8-9 percent), but the South has relatively fewer of elderly unattached to families.

Within the South there were differences between the races in terms of family attachment of the poor elderly. More whites than blacks, relatively, were unattached to families.

Since relatively fewer of Southern elderly poor live alone and even fewer blacks they are less physically isolated than in other regions. This has an advantage in that the day-to-day needs, especially related to health, can be monitored by the other family members. This kind of care is left to the occasional social worker or other agency person for those elderly who are unattached to families and frequently living in isolation.

While the elderly black poor are less likely to live in isolation, there is yet a greater problem among blacks—that they live less long than whites. The shorter life span of blacks is reflected in distributions of the poor population by age. Equally relevant to these data which show a greater proportion of white elderly than black elderly among the poor, is that for the most part whites do not experience poverty until reaching old age. Blacks have higher susceptibility to poverty at all ages, but the difference in poverty incidence between the non-elderly and the elderly is not as great as for whites, since so many blacks have been poor throughout their lifetime.

One-quarter of white families headed by an elderly person were poor and over half of similar black families (Table 43), The poverty incidence among those elderly unattached to families was even more severe (Table 44). Half of white and over seven out of ten black elderly unrelated individuals were poor. So while the South has less of an elderly poor population relative to other age groups among the poor the poverty rates for the elderly are especially high. Compared to the non-South the Southern poverty rates for families headed by an elderly person were twice as high (see Chapter I, page 5).

Residence of the Elderly Poor

The residence of the elderly poor population varies from that of the total elderly population and the total poor population. Among the aged population, both poor and non-poor, a higher proportion lived in rural areas than the total (elderly and non-elderly) population — 41 percent compared to 36 percent. Since rural outmigration has been more pronounced among the non-elderly, a relatively older population has been left behind. Also, as shown previously, poor families are more likely to be rural residents than the total population.

Previously it was shown that relatively more whites than blacks were rural residents. This was also true among the elderly. Of poor families headed by an older person nearly six out of ten white compared to five out of ten black lived in rural areas (Table 45).

Poor elderly persons unattached to a family are much more likely to be urban residents than elderly family heads. Of elderly poor whites unattached to families, over six out of ten were urban residents and of blacks, two out of three. This group also had higher proportions in smaller urban places 2,500-49,999 population.

The white elderly were more likely to be rural residents than the black. However, the black had higher incidence of poverty than the white in all residential places.

| Places 2,500-9,999 | 25 | 57 |

Source: Table 47.

As the preceding breakdown shows, in rural areas about two out of three black elderly families were poor compared to over one-third of whites. In the central cities, (the place where elderly black poverty rates were lowest) 43 percent of blacks and 16 percent of whites were poor—a nearly three-fold difference. The white rates varied more by place of residence than the black rates.

The poverty rates for elderly not living in families were the most severe of all groups (Table 49). The white poverty incidence for rural residents was seven out of ten and for urbanized areas nearly five out of ten. The corresponding comparisons for blacks were 87 percent in rural areas and 78 percent in urbanized areas. In general, the white elderly had greater variation in their poverty incidence depending on residence than did the black, both for those elderly living in families and those not.

The data regarding the residential patterns of the elderly have implications for outreach activity, implications that could be lost unless elderly families and unrelated individuals are considered separately. Public and private programs for the elderly living in families need to have strong rural directions. Programs specifically designed to reach the elderly who live alone need a strong urban focus. The enrollment of the elderly onto SSI (Supplemental Security Income) needs especially strong outreach into rural areas. A special regional commitment to aiding the rural black elderly is needed since poverty incidence was as high as seven out of ten families headed by an elderly person in Mississippi and about nine out of ten elderly unattached to families in Mississippi, Alabama, South Carolina, Arkansas, Georgia, and Louisiana.

General economic development of rural areas offering a wider range of better paying jobs obviously will help the elderly who live in families with working age adults, while the elderly who live alone will be little benefitted. Increasing the income of the latter group must to a greater extent depend on improvements in public programs—the increase of benefits and/or extension of coverage for both SSI and Social Security.

The Elderly and Social Security

The primary source of income for those 65 years or older is Social Security. As with most comparisons, the South is poorer than the United States in terms of Social Security payments[2]. A slightly smaller proportion of the South's aged persons (72 percent) than the nation's aged (76 percent) received payments. Somewhat fewer Southerners of both races benefitted than their counterparts in the nation.

More importantly, however, many fewer blacks than whites, both in the South and the nation, received benefits. Whereas three-quarters of elderly whites were recipients, less than two-thirds of blacks were.

Since receipt of Social Security payments is dependent upon the person's having had "covered employment," those whose working years were spent in employment excluded from the system do not benefit. Most employment is now included under Social Security or in a federal government retirement system, but many of today's elderly persons spent their working years in employment that was not covered at the time. The lower rates of receipt for blacks can partly be explained by their occupations. As we have seen, a high percentage of black women have been employed in domestic service which came under the Social Security system only in 1955. Even so, their participation, though required by law, depends on the cooperation of their household employer who as an individual can more easily ignore the law than a business. Similarly the past concentration of black males in farming occupations would partially account for their low rate of receipt. Social Security was extended to agricultural labor in 1951 and to farm self-employment in 1955.

In addition to having employment in "covered" sectors, a worker must have accumulated forty quarters (i.e., ten years) in "covered" work to receive the full benefit; otherwise, a reduced benefit is paid. Workers employed in the marginal sectors of the economy, such as day laborers, by-the-day domestics, or those working for small employers who, in an effort to save costs, however illegally, did not deduct and pay Social Security contributions, are likely to be excluded from the benefits of the system in their old age. Blacks are most affected by these factors.

Only one Southern state had a higher proportion of all elderly receiving Social Security benefits than the national average—Florida (Table 48). This can doubtless be credited to Florida's unique position as a haven for retired, mostly non-poor whites from outside the South. Elderly blacks in Florida do not fare nearly so well—their percentage receiving benefits was lower than the regional average.

Not only do fewer of the South's elderly receive benefits, but the average benefit is lower than the nation's (Table 50). Since the benefit is determined by the earnings on which contributions were paid, lower-paid Southern workers face a lower retirement income than their national counterparts. The U. S. average benefit for retired workers in 1969 was $1205 compared with the Southern average of $1080; yet the individual maximum benefit permitted under the Act in 1969 was $2616 and for a family was $5213[3] Thus the actual nationwide average benefit was 46 percent of the maximum for an individual and the South's, 41 percent.

CHART 6

POVERTY INCIDENCE: SOCIAL SECURITY RECIPIENTS 65 YEARS OR OLDER IN THE SOUTH, 1970

Source: Table 51.

The lower benefits in the South resulted in a higher poverty incidence among the aged recipients in the South—over one-third—compared to the nation, over one-quarter. The South's higher rate of poverty among elderly Social Security recipients was more acute for blacks and, secondarily, for rural residents. Well over half (59 percent) of recipient blacks in the South and nearly half (45 percent) of recipient rural residents were poor. Almost one-third of whites and urban dwellers were similarly affected.

All Southern states, except Florida, had higher poverty rates among elderly Social Security beneficiaries than the national average. Black recipients were especially impoverished in Mississippi, Arkansas, and South Carolina where at least two-thirds were poor. Among the rural beneficiaries the proportions of poor were particularly high in Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Tennessee, South Carolina, and Arkansas (Table 51).

Social Security and Sex Discrimination

The Social Security beneficiary and benefit data from the Census did not include any information according to sex, but the following data from the Social Security Administration are suggestive of regional patterns. The individual recipient, whether a retired worker or surviving spouse, fares worse than a retired male worker and spouse in terms of approaching a non-poverty level income.

*Monthly average times 12. Source: Social Security Bulletin, Annual Statistical Supplement, 1971, p. 48.

The data for the South, if available, would no doubt show lower annual average benefits, since average wages in the region are lower. The relative magnitude of the relationships would probably be the same. The retired female worker receives, in her own right as a retired earner, the lowest benefit. On the average, this is lower than that received by a survivor widow on the basis of her marital status. Both groups of women, in any case, are living on less income than a retired male. The law, however, has been most favorable to the retired worker and spouse in terms of a non-poverty income. And the law does discriminate with respect to working couples — the benefit for husband-wife couples who were both earners is not twice that for a single beneficiary. Furthermore, the benefit for a male retiree and non-earner wife may be greater than that for husband and wife earners.[4]

The Elderly and Other Income Services

A few especially fortunate among the elderly also have private pensions but most have no income other than Social Security. In 1970 only about one in four newly entitled Social Security beneficiaries also were receiving a private pension.[5] Most of these people constituted the group of elderly who were not poor. On the other hand, there is a substantial group—in the South 16 percent of all aged—who did not receive Social Security and were not poor. They were either supported by other family members such as their children, had continuing income from earnings or other non-earned income (securities, rents, etc.), or received pensions but no Social Security (probably not a large group). The poor who received Social Security amounted to nearly one-fourth of white Southern aged, but nearly 40 percent of poor aged blacks.

The group that did not receive Social Security and was poor amounted to nearly 9 percent of the white elderly and one-quarter of black elderly. Many of this group would have received Old Age Assistance (OAA), though many elderly with no chance of receiving any kind of retirement continued to work well into their years. Table 52 shows the proportion of the aged who received OAA in the Southern states and the average benefit. In general, the percentage of the state's elderly receiving OAA has an inverse relationship to that state's Social Security recipient rate and a direct relationship to its poverty rate for the elderly. Louisiana had the highest rate of OAA recipients, followed by Alabama and Mississippi. Florida and Virginia had low percentages of elderly on OAA; their Social Security benefits are relatively high, and their elderly poverty rates, relatively low. The average monthly payments, even in the states with less poverty among the elderly were quite low, ranging from $45 per month to $73.

The extreme poverty experienced by over one-third of Southern elderly may be alleviated by the new federal program, Supplemental Security Income (SSI) which replaced OAA on January 1, 1974. However, it is critical that eligibles be enrolled. This program guarantees a minimum income floor for the elderly. This monthly minimum was as of July 1, 1974, $146 for an elderly individual and $219 for an elderly couple.[6] Considering that the average Social Security benefits in the South (1969) were below this, as were average OAA payments, this program could undoubtedly be a boon to the region. The minimum benefits under SSI are still below the current poverty lines, but for many elderly poor this will represent a considerable improvement.

States which could potentially gain the most under SSI are those with low proportions of the elderly on Social Security — Louisiana, and to a lesser extent Mississippi and Georgia; those with low average Social Security benefits—Mississippi, Arkansas, Tennessee, Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, and North Carolina; and those with low average OAA benefits—Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Georgia. However, none of these benefits will accrue automatically. Only a vigorous effort to enroll the eligible population will ensure that the intent of the law is carried out.

The annual maximum benefits under SSI are below the poverty line by a small amount for couples but more for individuals. Thus, raising them to the poverty levels would be relatively cheap compared to the total cost of the program. The annual maximum for an elderly individual is $1752 compared to a 1973 poverty level of $2119 and fcr a couple is $2628 compared to a 1973 poverty level of $2662.

An automatic cost-of-living clause, similar to the Social Security improvements in 1972, is needed for SSI to adequately take inflation rates into account. However, states should assist their elderly poor by supplementing SSI.

CHAPTER V
FAMILY INCOME AND THE POVERTY LINE

SUMMARY

1. Two-thirds of Southern white families had income at least twice that of poverty level income, yet three-quarters of black families had incomes less than twice the poverty line.
2. 823,000 families in the region had incomes less than 50 percent of the poverty line. This figure represented four percent of all white Southern families and 17 percent of all black Southern families. Female-headed families of both races were disproportionally represented among this group.
3. About half of all poor families headed by females and one third of poor families headed by males live on less than 50 percent of the poverty level.
4. The figure of 823,000 families does not fully reflect the impact of this extreme poverty. Over 3.25 million family members lived in these families and of these 1.7 million were black and 1.6 million, white. Added to this were 772,000 poor unrelated individuals who lived at income below half the poverty line (243,000 black and 525,000 white). This meant that a total of 4,115,000 persons — 40 percent of the South's poor, were living on less than 50 percent of the poverty level income.
5. The Bureau of Labor Statistics' urban family budgets may be a more realistic approach to setting living standards than current poverty level guidelines. Three living standards are defined by the Bureau — low, moderate and higher — and are figured for a hypothetical urban family of four with a male head aged 38 and a wife who is not employed. The three living standards are defined by a mix of goods and services necessary for the specified level. Under the BLS budget in 1969, $6,544 was set for the lower level, $10,064 for the moderate, and $14,571 for the higher. The poverty line, however, for a comparable family was only $3,745.
6. Over two-thirds of white families in the South comparable to the BLS prototype family were above the moderate standard, but only one quarter of black families.
7. Applying ratios of the BLS standards and the poverty level to the income of all families indicates that as many as three-quarters of white, but only about one-third of black families lived in moderate or better circumstances in 1969.

The bulk of this report has, by necessity, concentrated on the extent of poverty in the South and the characteristics of the poor population. Unintentionally, this has tended to imply that those above the poverty line are not in economic peril. The term "near-poor", used to describe those whose incomes are no more than 125 percent of the poverty line income, is recognition of their precarious status. Advancing above the poverty line takes only one dollar and those who are relatively close to the poverty standard are indeed little better off than the "official" poor. To reach even relatively comfortable economic circumstances one must advance considerably beyond the poverty line.

The interruption of earnings due to loss of a job, layoff, sickness, or other reasons; the loss of a secondary earner; the addition of new family members, a child born or an elderly person joining the family, are all events which can easily throw a near-poor family into the poor classification. Those whose incomes are above those of the near-poor, too, are not free from the possibility of falling into poverty. Accordingly, it is essential to analyze the distribution of families around the poverty line. In addition, the parsimony of the poverty index, requires a look at those above the poverty line.

Family Income and the Poverty Line

The method of analyzing family income compared with the poverty income is by expressing family income as a percent of poverty line income.

If family income is equivalent to income at the poverty line, the relationship is expressed as 100 percent; if double the poverty income, 200 percent; and if half, 50 percent; and so on. Hence the 17 percent of all Southern families below the poverty line had income of less than 100 percent of the poverty line. Seven percent of Southern families were 50 percent below the poverty line. About one-quarter of Southern families were above the poverty line but less than 200 percent of it; a slightly smaller proportion fell in the interval between 200 and 300 percent of the poverty line; and over one-third were above the 300 percent mark.

Data for the two races showed vastly different patterns. White families were highly clustered above 200

The curves were approximated by plotting the frequencies at the mid-points of the intervals. percent and black families below that point. Two-thirds of Southern white families had income at least twice that of poverty line income, yet three-quarters of black families had incomes less than twice poverty line income.

The curve for black families is heavily weighted toward the low end. It peaks at the interval 50 to 75 percent of the poverty level, and remains high up to the point of income 125 percent of the poverty line. The curve then tapers off markedly. In contrast, the curve for white families begins low, rises steadily to the point 125 percent, and then remains constant up to the point 300 percent of the poverty line. A substantial proportion of white families are found above this point. The black and white curves cross at 200 percent of the poverty line, blacks having higher frequencies below that point and whites higher frequencies above it (see Tables 53 and 54 for state details).

Higher income families, on the average, had smaller families, and lower income ones, larger families. Thus 65 percent of white families, but only 62 percent of white family members, were above 200 percent of the poverty line. Similarly, 26 percent of black families, but only 20 percent of black family members were above 200 percent of the poverty line. Below the poverty line were 41 percent of black families, but 45 percent of black family members.

A comparison of white and black family members shows the same preponderance of blacks at the bottom as whites at the top. Over 60 percent of whites were above 200 percent, but only 20 percent of blacks. A great many poor families were so far below the poverty line as to merit special examination.

Below 50% of the Poverty Line

Four percent of all white Southern families and 17 percent of all black Southern families had incomes lower in 1969 than 50 percent of the poverty line. This poorest group of the region amounted to 823,000 families. Following are some examples by family size of the maximum income, in 1969, a family could receive and still fall below 50 percent of the line: $2,209 for a male-headed family of five persons or $442 per family member; $1,863 for a female-headed family of four persons or $466 per family member; and $1,197 for a male-headed family of two or $599 per family member. These incomes generated little purchasing power. The data on these families included breakdowns by race and sex though not by age, but many of the families doubtless were headed by the aged since, as we have seen, incomes of the elderly were notoriously inadequate.

Blacks were disproportionally represented in this group (incomes below 50 percent of the poverty line) —45 percent compared with 41 percent of all poor families (and 17 percent of the South's families). Female-headed families were even more prevalent among the group—40 percent compared with 30 percent among all poor and 12 percent of the South's families. Both black and white female-headed families were disproportionally represented among the very poorest.

Of poor female-headed families about half of both white and black had incomes below 50 percent of a poverty line income. Of poor male-headed families fewer, about one-third, of both white and black had similarly low incomes.

The count of the number of families, 823,000, does not fully reflect the impact of this extreme poverty, for over three and one-third million people lived in these families. Of these, 1.7 million were black and 1.6 million, white.

Again the average larger size of black families resulted in their comprising a greater share of poorest family members than of poorest families. The number of unrelated individuals who were below half the poverty line was 772,000—243,000 black and 525,000 white. Thus a staggering total of 4,115,000 persons, 40 percent of the South's poor, were living on less than half of the poverty level income. This amounted to 43 percent of all poor blacks and 38 percent of poor whites.

It must be recognized that many of these poorest people were children. To a great extent, poor families headed by females have related children in the home, and to a greater extent than male-headed families. Since female-headed families were over-represented among the very poor, children also were. At the earliest stages of life when nutrition is critical, the income available for food from an income less than half of the poverty level is never enough. And the economy food plan, used as the basis for the poverty line, is already nutritionally inadequate. In practice, these poorest families would have to spend income on food that would normally go for other things.

An Alternative to the Poverty Classification

A completely different approach to setting living standards is the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) urban family budgets.[1] These budgets are figured for hypothetical urban families of four persons with a male head aged 38 and a wife who is not employed. Three living standards—low, moderate, and higher—are defined by a mix of goods and services necessary for the specified level.

The costs of the goods and services are determined, and the total budget is calculated. The low budget level assumes that the family is a renter, performs many of its own services, uses free recreation, and either uses public transportation or has bought a six-year-old automobile. The moderate level includes a mix of homeowners and renters, and nearly all families have an automobile purchased when it was two years old.

[1]U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, Three Standards of of Living, Bulletin No. 1570-5, 1967.

Higher budget families have higher levels of home-ownership than the moderate level; automobile ownership is universal though second-hand purchases are made by a substantial segment; and the family has a major medical policy (all levels include hospital-surgical plans). Both the moderate and higher budgets include increasingly higher expenses for services, appliances, and automobiles. The at-home food budgets for the three levels are the Department of Agriculture's lower, moderate, and higher standards. All provide adequate nutrition. The percentage of meals away from home increases with each level. For the same period as the poverty data (1969) these three budgets were priced at: $6,544 for the lower level; $10,064, the moderate; and $14,571, the higher.[2] The poverty line for a comparable family, a nonfarm family of four with a male head, was $3,745.

Southern families' incomes can be compared to the BLS budgeted amounts to determine their adequacy with respect to low, moderate, and higher standards of living. Thus, the families above poverty can be more accurately differentiated.

The number of Southern families which exactly met the criteria of the hypothetical four-person family was over 600,000 in 1970. The income[3] of these families was compared to the BLS standards. Over two-thirds of white families were above the moderate standard, but only one-quarter of blacks.

| Moderate to high | 38 | 18 |

Source: Tables 56 and 57.

In order to use the BLS living standards as benchmarks for gauging all families' incomes they were converted to percents of the poverty line, following the procedure used for all families' income (Chart 7 and Tables 53 and 54). The income standards are expressed as a ratio of the applicable poverty line for the hypothetical urban family ($3,745).

|---|---|---|
| Low | $ 6,544 | 175 |
| Moderate | 10,064 | 269 |
| Higher | 14,571 | 389 |

[2]U. S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, Three Budgets for an Urban Family of Four Persons, 1969-70, Supplement to Bulletin 1570-5, 1972, p. 16. The 1973 levels for the three budgets are low, $8,181; moderate, $12,623; and high, $18,201 according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

[3]Income in the Census was reported in intervals so the nearest interval was compared to the BLS standard: $6,500 for $6,544; $10,000 for $10,064; and $15,000 for $14,571.

CHART 8

COMPARISON OF BLS BUDGETS TO THE DISTRIBUTION OF FAMILIES BY INCOME AND RACE IN THE SOUTH, 1970

Family Income as a Percent of the Poverty Line

The BLS Budgets expressed as a percent of the poverty line were superimposed on Chart 7.

Therefore, about 200 percent of the poverty line would represent a low standard of living; less than 300 percent of the poverty line, a moderate standard; and close to 400 percent of the poverty line, a higher standard. While it would be inappropriate to ascribe these ratios strictly to all family types other than the BLS prototype, it is not inappropriate to use them as general guideline for income adequacy.

Chart 8 compares the ratios for low, moderate, and high standards with the data in Chart 7. Slightly over one-quarter of white families fell below the low standard of living mark, about one-quarter between the low and moderate standards, and nearly one-half above the moderate standard. Two-thirds of black families fell below the low standard of living, less than one-fifth between the low and moderate standards, and less than 15 percent above the high level. While close to three-quarters of white families lived in moderate or better circumstances, only somewhat over one-third of blacks were so fortunate. Clearly, not only is poverty a severe problem among the black population, but having an equitable share of income among those who are above poverty levels is equally as severe a problem.

The data in this chapter highlights the primary conclusion of previous chapters that in the South blacks are poorer than whites by any standard. In this chapter we have seen that blacks cluster below 200 percent of the poverty line and whites, above. Two-thirds of blacks live below "moderate" economic circumstances and three-quarters of whites, above. The agenda for the South's future, while necessarily concerned with white and black poverty, cannot ignore the continuing disparity in incomes between blacks and whites which has pushed blacks to the bottom and pulled whites to the top. The differences in economic position are so dramatically different that an immediate regional commitment to erasing them is essential. It is not enough to wait for the gradual equalizing effects of natural economic improvement. Our two societies cannot become one until we take affirmative action against the racial inequality in all institutions and aspects of Southern life.

The Spanish-American Poor Population in Florida and Texas: A Special Note[1]

The Spanish-American poor populations of Florida and Texas were the only ones in the South statistically large enough to make examination meaningful. In Texas there were over 700,000 and in Florida, nearly 70,000. Not only were there over ten times as many Spanish-Americans in Texas as in Florida, but their poverty rate was over twice as high—36 percent compared to 15 percent. The composition of the poor population in Texas was predominantly children (54 percent) and adults less than 65 years (40 percent) with the elderly, over 65 years, very few (6 percent). In Florida adults less than 65 years comprised 48 percent of the poor, a much higher proportion than among all poor persons in the 11-state South (42 percent); children, 39 percent; and the elderly, 13 percent, more than in Texas.

The number of poor Spanish-American families in Florida was 15,000 and their poverty rate was 14 percent; in Texas, 133,000 and a poverty rate of 31 percent. The poverty rate of Florida Spanish-American families was higher than the Florida white family rate (10 percent). The Texas Spanish-American poverty rate was well above the state white rate and virtually the same as the black family poverty rate (33 percent).

Female-headed families comprised a smaller proportion of poor Spanish-American families in both states, 23 percent, compared to the regional average for all families, 29 percent. Their poverty rates were severe—in Florida, 33 percent, which was above the rate for white female heads in Florida (25 percent); in Texas, 57 percent, which was nearly as high as the Texas black female-head poverty rate, 59 percent.

In terms of residence all Spanish-American families in Florida and Texas were more urbanized (central cities and urban fringe together) than the total families —in Florida 89 percent compared to 61 percent and in Texas, 66 percent compared to 61 percent. The poor Spanish-Americans, however, were less urbanized — 85 percent in Florida and 54 percent in Texas. In Florida a much smaller proportion of poor, only seven percent, were rural residents than of poor whites or blacks. In Texas approximately the same share of poor Spanish-Americans, 23 percent, as poor blacks lived in rural areas.

For male family heads the working poor percentages for Spanish-Americans in both states, 78 percent in Florida and 80 percent in Texas, exceeded those for poor whites and blacks in the same states. For poor female heads in Florida the proportion of working poor, 48 percent, was higher than for whites and much lower than for blacks. In Texas the percent of working poor among female heads was lower than for both whites and blacks.

In terms of education the poor Spanish-Americans in Florida were better educated than those in Texas. In Florida, of family heads 25-64 years, 25 percent of males and 34 percent of females completed high school or more education. They compared unfavorably to poor whites and somewhat more favorably to poor blacks in Florida. In Texas, however, only 9 percent of males and 8 percent of female heads completed high school—much lower completion rates than for either whites or blacks.

Fewer of all Spanish-American families in Florida than Texas were in the poorest classification—income less than 50 percent the poverty line—five percent compared to 11 percent. However, on the other hand, these poorest families as a proportion of Spanish-American poor families was less in Texas (36 percent) than in Florida (41 percent).

Definitions

Family Concepts

Family: Two or more persons living in the same household who are related by marriage, blood or adoption.

Unrelated Individual: A person living in a household alone or with one or more persons to whom unrelated, or living in group quarters. All poverty data on unrelated individuals exclude inmates of institutions, members of the Armed Forces living in barracks, college students living in dormitories (including fraternities and sororities), and unrelated individuals under 14 years old.

Race and Related Concepts

Race: In the 1970 Census persons were asked to indicate their race by selecting White, Negro or Black, Indian, Japanese, Chinese, Filipino, Hawaiian, Korean, Other (specify).

* Black: In this report, includes persons who indicated their race as "Negro" or "Black" in the Census.
* Other Races: In this report, includes all persons who did not indicate their race as White, Negro or Black. Includes Indians, Japanese, etc. In the South in 1970, 39,000 of all family heads and 10,000 of poor heads were in this category. Their poverty rate was 26 percent.

Spanish-Americans: Persons who reported Spanish as their mother tongue, as well as persons in families in which the head or wife reported Spanish as his or her mother tongue. Also in Texas includes persons not of Spanish language but of Spanish surname. The Spanish-American classification is not a racial classification. In Texas and Florida, of Spanish-Americans, 99 percent and 97 percent respectively were classified as white racially. See also Appendix A for a description of the Spanish-American poor.

Residence Concepts

South: The population of the states of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Census South: The population of the 11 states classified as the South and the District of Columbia, Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

Urban:

Urbanized Areas: These contain a city (or twin cities) of 50,000 or more plus the surrounding closely settled incorporated and unincorporated areas which meet certain criteria of size or density.

* Central cities: Population of cities of 50,000 or more in urbanized areas.
* Urban fringe: Population of the urbanized area outside the central city.

Other Urban:

* Places 10,000 to 49,999.
* Places of 2,500 to 9,999.

Rural:

Those remaining areas not included in any of the urban categories, including the areas outside urbanized areas and with fewer than 2,500 population.

Income Concepts

Income: Total income is the sum of the dollar amounts of money respondents reported receiving as earnings, Social Security, public assistance, interest, dividends, retirement pensions, and other regular payments. Nonmonetary payments, such as commodities and food stamps, are specifically excluded. Family income is the total combined incomes of all family members.

Earnings include wage and salary income and net self-employment income.

Social Security income includes U.S. Government payments to retired or disabled workers and to dependents of insured workers; also here includes railroad retirement; and excludes Medicare reimbursements.

Public assistance includes amounts from Federal, state, and local public programs such as aid to the blind, disabled, aged, and dependent children and excludes payments for hospital or other medical care.

Poor Population: Those families (and all family members) and unrelated individuals whose 1969 income fell below the 1969 poverty level relevant to their characteristics.

Poverty Incidence or Poverty Rate: The percent of a group who are poor—whose income falls below the poverty level appropriate to their characteristics. For example, the poverty rate for Southern female-headed families is the percent of all Southern female-headed families whose income falls below the poverty level for their family type.

Poverty Level: Using criteria and a methodology established by the Social Security Administration and modified by a Federal Interagency Committee, the Bureau of the Census constructed a series of poverty income levels for use with the 1970 Census. The sliding scale poverty levels take into account various factors such as family size (including number of children), sex of the family head, and whether farm or nonfarm residence. It does not include regional or other geographic area differentials. Examples of 1969 poverty levels are:

Nonfarm Residence:

- A male unrelated individual under 65 years: $1974.
- A female unrelated individual 65 years or older: $1751.
- A 3-person family with: a female head, $2830; a male head, $2937.
- A 4-person family with: a female head, $3725; a male head, $3745.
- A family with 7 or more persons and a male head: $6116.

Farm residence:

- A 4-person family with: a female head, $3159; a male head, $3197.
- A family with 7 or more persons and a male head: $5185.

Income Deficit: The difference (in dollars) between a family's or an unrelated individual's actual income and the applicable poverty level.

Aggregate Income Deficit: The sum of the income deficits for a group—for instance, the aggregate income deficit for families.

Employment Concepts

Working Poor: Those poor persons who reported that they were at work or with a job but not at work (temporarily absent because of illness, vacation) during the week that the Census was taken. Excluded are the unemployed and those not in the labor force.

Occupation: The terms white collar, blue collar, farming, and service workers include the following major

Census Occupational Groups:

White Collar: Professional, technical, and kindred workers.
Managers and administrators, except farm.
Sales workers.
Clerical and kindred workers.

Blue Collar: Craftsmen and kindred workers.
Operatives, except transport.
Transport equipment operatives.
Laborers, except farm.

Farming: Farmers and farm managers.
Farm laborers and farm foremen.

Service Workers: Service workers, except private household.
Private household workers.

Labor Force: Those who are in the labor force include the employed and the unemployed. (The unemployed include those looking for work within the past 60 days and those waiting to be called back to a job from which they are laid off.)

BLACK. "Black" is synonomous on this map with the Census 1970 definition of "Negro."

NUMBERS ON COUNTIES. The numbers are the percent black population of the total population in each county. The percent was calculated to one decimal place. However, the decimal place was dropped to leave a whole number (e.g., 4.0% to 4.9% is shown as 4%). Where there are no blacks, it is indicated by "0"; where the percent black is less than 1.0%, it is indicated by "✱".

VIRGINIA. The percent black for nine independent cities is: Chesapeake 23%; Hampton 25%; Lynchburg 23%; Newport News 28%; Norfolk 28%; Portsmouth 39%; Richmond 42%; Roanoke 19%; Virginia Beach 9%. The remaining 29 independent cities have been combined by the Census with adjoining counties.

PUBLISHED BY THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL, JULY, 1973

ON HUMAN RELATIONS COUNCILS

By J. Edwin Stanfield

A friend of mine used to say, "People do what they want to do and what they have to do -- usually in that order."

Proponents of the "Black Power" movement are now operating on the assumption that white Americans, generally speaking, will do justice only if they have to -- not because they want to. There still are voices -- that of Martin Luther King, for one -- which speak of the power of love to transform and hold out the hope of tapping some latent sense of justice in white America. "Do to us what you will and we will still love you," King wrote eight years ago, "...we will soon wear you down by our capacity to suffer." He says it still, but somehow with less conviction and with fewer responding "Amens."

Objective indications must not be encouraging to him. A recent Louis Harris poll shows that white prejudiced has slackened very little in three years. Sixty-three percent of white Americans now think all demonstrations are harmful -- compared to fifty percent three years ago.

In answer to the Black Power contention that white Americans will respond only to pressure and that communities will change discriminatory patterns only in preference to civil disorder or economic loss, Dr. King has said, "We should never forget that we are in the majority nowhere....It would be foolish to say we can win freedom by ourselves."

But, if I do not misunderstand, Black Power does not mean the power to win freedom for Negroes by majority vote. It means organization for the exercise of a sort of negative power, the power to deny enjoyment of freedom to whites and to require black freedom of the white majority on pain of loss of their own. If it does not lie within the power of Negroes to achieve justice and freedom alone, neither does it lie within the power of the white majority to retain and enjoy affluence and privilege and freedom by themselves. By definition, justice and freedom are shared values and mutual goals. Even a small minority of Negro citizens, if determined, can use white bias as a judo wrestler uses his opponent's weight against him to force a narrowing and impoverishment of the public life as the penality for racial prejudice. More than a year before the "black power" slogan was coined, James Forman summed it up: "If we can't get a seat at the table, then we'll kick the legs off the ... table!"

Like it or not, Black Power is a reality to which response must be made. We must ask ourselves what is the most constructive course in the face of its challenge. The question of social justice now is whether we shall do real justice because we want to or that sorry sort of justice which otherwise we shall have to do. And that is the same as saying that white Americans have before them still more clearly the choice of allowing Negroes the same freedoms and privileges they enjoy -- or forfeiting these themselves. He cannot remain free who chooses to deny others their freedom.

From its beginning the Civil Rights Movement has confronted us with a national crisis. The cry of Black Power only heightens it. I use the word crisis very carefully. It is a cognate of the Greek word for "judgment". It seems to me that the civil rights movement, like nothing before it -- with the possible exception of the Civil War, has brought this nation to a testing, to a judgment. The questions are being weighed: Can American democracy be made to work? Can it provide an adequate basis for human community in the changed circumstances of this century? Can required changes be made within its normal processes? Is it possible for citizens of all races, creeds, colors and conditions to live and work in decency and dignity, in openness and availability toward on another? Is it possible, out of the incredibly complex interdependencies of industrial and metropolitan America, to create genuine community?

Incidentally, the problem is not, as I am sure you realize, one of race relations only. Perhaps it is not even a problem of race relations primarily. It is increasingly evident, for example, that the economic breach in community is wider than the ethnic or racial break.

Anton Boisen suggested many years ago that an emotional upheaval in an individual is basically a good and necessary attempt to reorganize one's psychic life in order to cope with new or newly-comprehended circumstances for which the old self is no longer adequate. If the psychic crisis is successfully weathered, he observed, people say the individual had a religious experience or "conversion." If it is not a successful attempt at reorganization, people say the person "cracked up" or became insane. I think it is just such an experience through which the corporate personality of America is passing. Perhaps we are to know in our lifetime whether, as a nation, we are to be converted or demented!

Our quest is for community. And our problem is to find patterns of community adequate to match the interdependencies of metropolitan society. Ours is a society which is fundamentally and qualitatively different from that which existed when most of the patterns and institutions we now have were formed. The question whether we can adapt our institutions and ourselves to changed circumstances may in fact be a question of our survival -- collectively as a nation and individually as human beings.

For interdependency without community is hell! I can think of no more apt portrait of hell than that fanciful one provided by C. S. Lewis in his little book, The Great Divorce. He described hell as a great, sprawling city in which one could build himself a new house simply by wishing for it. The city was expanding by geometric progression, and it was full of empty houses, because citizens kept moving away from one another. It was so much easier to move than to bother with other people!

His description of hell sounds distressingly like New York, of course, or Chicago or Los Angeles or Detroit or Cleveland or Baltimore or Atlanta or Birmingham or Houston or New Orleans. The travails that all of these places have experienced are object lessons in the hell that is interdependency without community.

But the hell of it is no less real -- for the interdependency is no less real -- in the countryside; it is only more diffused. A little community like Selma, for all of its complaints about "outside agitators," was happily agitated by the news that an outside company like Hammermill Paper was going to locate a plant there. And Hammermill, up in Erie, Pennsylvania, found itself negotiating with some outsiders who have a secondary interest in what goes on in Selma, Alabama. There are no "outsiders" anymore, for our interdependency knows no geographic boundaries. Clearly there can no longer be geographic boundaries on community, either. The flight to the suburbs is pitiable temporizing, -- an attempt to re-create artificially the homogeneous community our grandfathers knew. We can no longer draw a line and declare that we have no obligation of openness and availability and responsibility beyond that.

At least not if we want to remain human. Human-ness means community. To the extent that we insist that we are to be left alone, or that others should be content to be left strictly alone -- to that extent we forfeit our full humanity. The ancient question of Job, "What is man...?," stripped of all incidentals and accidents of possession and station, "What is man?" remains for each to answer. But there is a dreadful answer implicit in behaviour which assumes that some lives matter little or not at all. One who thus refuses community carries within himself the hidden seed of damnation -- the conviction that the value of his own life is relative and not absolute, which gives him a vested interest in the misfortune or incapacity of others.

In such a day as this, what is to be the role of councils on human relations?

It seems to me that human relations councils must play a dual role. They must oppose, to put the matter negatively, both the separatism of traditional segregationists and the separatism of Black Power. To put it positively, they must struggle both for the justice that is more than Black Power can effectively force and the mercy that is more than prejudiced and oppressive whites deserve. There can be no viable community at this point in history without both justice and mercy. But to insist on both is to live in tension.

Yet it is a creative tension to which human relations councils must call both whites and blacks, asking both to accept scorn and rejection from two sides.

One thrust of human relations councils, I have said, must be the thrust toward justice for the oppressed. There can be no compromise, no half-heartedness on the matter of justice. Civil rights are not negotiable. Economic justice is not debatable. We dare not temporize on these issues, for community in our time is not possible, except on a foundation of profound justice.

There was a time, not so long ago -- when this was a rural country, when a community could be held together, however inadequately, on the basis of personal relationships and honest charitableness. It was in those days that most of the institutions of our society took on their definitive forms. Relationships were primary. People knew one another -- knew practically everyone upon whom they depended in their daily lives. Those were the days of pietism in religion, of neighborhood schools, of intensely local government, of personalized industry and labor relations, of courts informed by the bowels of human mercy, and of welfare informed by human charity.

Those days have forever passed. We have poignant reminders of them, still, in the southern phenomenon of genuine kindness and courtesy in all personal and individual relationships of whites with Negroes -- but simultaneous refusal to lift a finger, or even an eyebrow, against those conditions which leave fellow citizens constantly in need of charity. Many a white southerner is living between two worlds and so justifies the characterization of a friend of mine: "They are the kindest, most generous, most hospitable people in the world -- only they'll kill you, if they don;t like you."

Gone are the days when personal industry and edification could gain acceptance. How often one hears the wistful argument, "Education is the answer. Negroes must earn acceptance!" No. Case study after case study has found whites in integrated neighborhoods keeping their distance from Negroes somewhat better educated than themselves. And I could cite examples of Negro Americans turned away from public facilities by people who, by any unit of measure except racial characteristics, were inferior to them.

Gone are the days when churches could, without apostasy, "stick to the business of religion," when righteousness could be considered a personal characteristic. Churches can no more avoid getting deeply involved in social issues (that is, if they are to make any pretense of relevance) than their members can drive their automobiles only on the highways they personally own!

Gone are the days when prattling about "states' rights" and "local control" made sense. When I can fly from Atlanta to New Orleans in one hour flat, don't talk to me about "states' rights" or try to justify myopic "local control."

Gone are the days when a business enterprise could be dealt with by the same rules that govern any other good citizen of a community. For industry in our day is, quite literally, nobody's business -- impersonal, amoral, and preoccupied.

Gone are the days when social welfare agencies could be responsibly satisfied with individual-oriented or family-oriented case work. Neither are the old assumptions about "deserving" and "undeserving" persons acceptable any longer. In our day most hapless individuals are victims of corporate problems, and welfare assistance is a matter of the person's rights and the society's responsibilities.

In short -- and to repeat -- justice, not charity, is the foundation of community and of good human relations in our industrial and metropolitan society. The first order of business for human relations councils is engagement, in the public arena, in what must be characterized as a struggle to make all institutions in society serve and nurture persons as ends in themselves -- never using them as means to other ends or units with widely varying degrees of value.

The other thrust of a human relations council is the thrust toward mercy. If there can be no compromise in the matter of justice toward the oppressed minorities neither should we neglect the offer of mercy, brooding and patient, to the offending majority.

The reason for this seems obvious to me, but I find a great number of people concerned with human relations who do not see it. The problem of race relations in the South and in America, as well as the problem of poverty in our affluent society, is white men's problem. It has been all along. We hear people talk about "the Negro problem." Nonsense. It is the white problem.

To speak of "mercy" in this context seems awkward -- even inappropriate -- and a bit of explanation is in order. The term implies that white people, insofar as they are prejudiced or bigoted, are essentially in a pathetic condition. I firmly believe that to be so.

But it is not easy to discern pathetic need when it is clothed in arrogance. For the most part, human relations councils in the South have not done so. Generally speaking, the state councils and their local affiliates have identified themselves as civil rights groups and have confined their ministration, understandably, and often of necessity, to the oppressed minority. The councils have been dealt with harshly. The reaction of the white public has ranged from violence to indifference. In relation to the hostile or indifferent white majority, councils have normally sought only to avoid or outwit -- sometimes to confront and condemn -- but rarely have they sought a therapeutic relationship. To the hatred and venom directed toward them, human relations council folks have most often reacted -- human-like -- with bitterness and disgust. It is not easy to add a dash of pity.

I have used the phrase "therapeutic relationship" and have done so advisedly. The white people of the South may be thought of as criminals or psychotics or sinners or ignoramuses -- but, view them as you will, we ought to address ourselves to the real needs of such people. We recognize that it is in the interest of society to rehabilitate criminals, to provide therapy for psychotics, to redeem sinners, and to educate the ignorant. By the same token, we need to do more for bigots than damn them.

Let us like white southerners collectively to a man who is a drunken wife-beater. Human relations councils should relate to him as his analyst, not as his mother-in-law. The civil rights groups have spoken and are speaking to the South. The federal government has spoken and is speaking to the South. Rights have been affirmed. Laws have been passed. The boundaries of decency and acceptable behaviour have been officially marked, if not effectively so. Nevertheless, the ravages of bigotry continue. If we are to avoid a terrible narrowing of the public life in the South, something more must be done for and with white southerners than civil rights groups or government can do. There is need of a group of people who will patiently "hear out" the foolishness of white moderates, as a psychotherapist listens to the delusional utterances of the mentally ill.

We must go beyond confrontation, for the problem of the white southerner is not lack of moral knowledge. For all his protestations of being sinned against, he knowshis own guilt damned well. He knows it so well that he cannot stand to look at himself as he really is. That is why confrontation is not enough. Few people, if any, can acknowledge guilt until they can see a way out, until they can find an individual or a group of people who, without approving or participating in their unacceptable behaviour, nevertheless continue to care about them and accept them as persons of some worth.

Therefore, simply on pragmatic grounds, on the basis of what is effective for amelioration of the society and the condition of the minority groups in it, human relations councils should fight off the temptation to justifiable scorn and bitterness toward white moderates and, to the extent possible, devise techniques and programs to reach them and teach them. Justice in the South will be barren, and brotherhood rare, unless more whites can be led to change than are now in prospect.

But this should be done on humanitarian grounds, too. After all, what is the business of a human relations council? It is to remove or remedy all that dehumanizes. That includes relief of the oppressed and redress of their grievances, for oppression does dehumanize its victims. But it includes more than that. We speak of southern whites as "brutalizing" Negroes. One is not of necessity dehumanized, however, by his being oppressed and exploited. But one is of necessity dehumanized when he oppresses and exploits, or acquiesces in oppression and exploitation.

It cannot be said that it is the duty of any person to enter into such therapeutic efforts. It is not a requirement of justice; it is a work of mercy. Certainly any Negro is readily to be excused, if he wishes. One can only sympathize with the weariness that Sammy Davis, Jr., expressed when he said that white folks would just have to find some other Negro to practice on!

It does seem to me that white liberals come nearer to having an obligation to worry about white men's souls and psyches. We whites who have seen the light might be instructed by Jesus' parable about the Pharisee who prayed, "O Lord, I thank thee that I am not as other men are...!"

White liberals tend to be a little like Charlie Brown's sister, Sally, who was terrified of going to kindergarten. She suffered weeks of agony as the time drew near for her to start to school. She even went to Lucy, the psychiatrist on the block.

She discovered, of course, that kindergarten was not bad at all -- indeed it was great fun. Here is what she said to Charlie Brown after her first day in attendance:

> "Some children just don't know their own minds! If a child is reluctant to go to kindergarten, the parents shouldn't fool around...just whisk him off! Make him go! It's ridiculous for a child to have this fear of kindergarten! I think we pamper kids too much these days anyway....Don't fiddle around with 'em! That's my motto! Send 'em off!"

Ask yourself what is the job that is uniquely that of a human relations council. It is not the securing of civil rights. Councils can and should help to secure them, to be sure, but there are agencies to secure them with or without human relations councils.

If the human relations council idea has any genius and destiny, it lies not in leadership of the oppressed but in potential for mission to the oppressing majority. There is a movement among the oppressed. To be sure it needs and deserves all possible aid, and those who are not themselves victims can provide technical assistance as neededand called for. But the movement is there, whereas there is as yet no significant movement among the oppressing or acquiescing majority. The dissatisfaction of the minorities is or will be aroused; what is needed is an answering dissatisfaction from those who sleep in the presence of moral -- and possibly mortal -- peril.

A member of the staff of the Southern Reginnal Council told about his efforts to secure help for people who were living in unheated slum housing in the midst of a severe cold snap in Atlanta in the winter of 1966. "We had some middle class white folks down there," he said, "but the emotion they felt was pity for these poor persons. As long as that is what they feel, they can't help much -- because the appropriate reaction is anger, not pity."

That is true.

On the other hand, I remember a certain human relations council leader who decided, with serious misgivings, to ask assistance on a community problem of a churchman who had turned down a request for assistance on another problem only a year before. To her surprise, she found him willing and even eager to respond and help. "I guess you really do have to keep holding the door open," she remarked.

And that is true.

What we need in human relations councils is people who have the large capacity to hold in constant, creative tension anger over the misery of the minority and pity for the insensitive soul--misery of the majority. A seminary professor used to say to his students, "Gentlemen, never preach about hell without a tear in your eye!" To speak effectively to the South, we do indeed have to speak of hell. We have also to speak with tears in our eyes.

It would be difficult for me to overstate the importance of biracial instruments, such as human relations councils, in the drive toward community in our society. Integration of our society is the only viable end, and sooner or later we must work together in order to live together. The future of this nation depends upon it. I think it not too much to say that the future of mankind depends upon it.

For if we cannot make community and humanity bloom in this hot-house microcosm of mild heterogeneity that is America, what hope is there for these fragile flowers in the rocky soil of a harshly divided world?

As Leslie Dunbar, a former executive director of the Southern Regional Council, once wrote:

> The South is a little place, and its survival means hardly anything to the world. Except that the only way it can, in fact, survive is to do something that would matter to the world, and that is to become a rarity, a biracial community at peace with itself.

DRAFT

A POSITION PAPER ON FUTURE ROLES AND RELATIONSHIPS OF THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL AND THE COUNCILS ON HUMAN RELATIONS

The suggestions which are to follow are made on the basis of certain assumptions and observations.

First, it is assumed that the movement toward human rights and wholesome community in the South must be biracial in nature. It may comprehend what is basically organization of Negro communities, but in the last analysis "black and white together" is the end and "black and white together" must be the means.

Second, it is observed that the Southern Regional Council, having no membership base, cannot be as effective an agent of such a movement alone as it can be in conjunction with the councils on human relations, which do have a membership base. The roles of the regional and state-local organizations are different, but they are mutually vital.

Third, it is assumed that fact-finding, research, and information are both the primary functions of the SRC and basic to everything else that it and the councils on human relations may do. The fundamental program of the SRC is production of ideas: insights into the region's needs and suggestions or guidance for programs to meet those needs. State and local councils are often better situated to carry out programs. They too, however, appear to be finding the functions of research and information to be of increasing importance to them. For this reason, a program of first-rate research and information must continue to be the first concern of the Southern Regional Council.

Fourth, it is assumed that the enlistment of both Negroes and white people, either directly into their membership or indirectly through affiliation of other organizations, for support of and participation in such a "movement" is fundamental to the role of the human relations councils. On this assumption, the policies and structure of the SRC's relationship to the councils should be always such as to encourage fulfillment of that role.

Rethinking of the roles and relationships of the SRC and the councils on human relations is made necessary by a number of considerations. One is the increasing complexity of the South's problems and concommitant sophistication and precision needed in dealing with them. Another is a disappointing rate of growth and level of local support of the human relations councils--a disappointment which may be blamed altogether on circumstances, but might also be due in part to lack of emphasis on these goals. A third is the blunt fact that, by all indications, foundations are growing reluctant to maintain the general operations of both the human relations councils and the Southern Regional Council.

We feel it only realistic, especially in view of the last-mentioned consideration in the preceding paragraph, to suggest that direct grants-in-aid to human relations councils from the SRC be discontinued, effective December 31, 1968. Alternative forms of mutual assistance will be outlined below, but this policy has some virtues in itself which should be elaborated upon.

Such a policy would be calculated to bring about an alignment of support policy with the autonomous structure of the human relations councils. The establishment of human relations councils was initially a program of the Southern Regional Council. They were set up to be autonomous, however, having their own policy boards and, as a desirable result, widely varying programs. Direct support through the existing grant-in-aid program has tended all too often to treat human relations councils as continuing program responsibilities of the SRC--which they clearly and by design are not. This leads to a number of awkward administrative problems. How can the SRC responsibly administer funds for the general operation of separate agencies over which the SRC intentionally has no policy control? The councils on human relations are separate, autonomous agencies; the SRC should relate to them as such, and vice versa. We would hope for continued cooperative program development. Indeed, as is made clear in our statement of assumptions, we consider such cooperation vital both to the SRC and the councils. But we believe that cooperation will be both more fruitful and more helpful to the agencies involved if the relationship is structured as between equal, allied agencies.

Such a policy is also frankly designed to press the issue of membership enlistment and involvement as of primary importance to the role of human relations councils. This is viewed as a vital part of the education process which must take place--particularly with regard to the white people of the South. The instincts of the foundations at this point are quite good: a human relations council should not exist and function only because outside agents wish it to; it is meaningful only to the extent to which it is the will of citizens within the community it serves.

Initiation of human relations councils can reasonably continue as a program of the SRC. Councils in some Deep South states will have to be considered as still in the beginning stages. There may be need, in the future, to begin some metropolitan area councils. In such cases, the intensive cultivation needed to organize local councils and provide technical assistance to policy boards in fund raising and membership enlistment could and should be provided by the SRC's department of field activities in liaison with the policy board of the nascent organization. A suggestion for provision of this service will be outlined below. What is important is that a distinction be made between provision of assistance in formative stages and provision of continuing general support which might tend to become a crutch on which the developing council depends for a more-than-reasonable period.

A second suggestion is that, from time to time, programs mutually helpful to the SRC and human relations councils, and generally needed in the South or a large portion of the South, be arranged by agreement between the SRC and the several councils. By substituting such programs for grants-in-aid for general support we would be providing both a continuing motivation for the growth and indigenous support of the human relations councils (important programs around which to rally support, plus incentive for a strong, working organization) and a measure of substantive assistance. Toward the latter end the funding of such programs should include as generous an overhead allowance as possible.

As the first such mutually helpful program, which we shall use as an example or prototype, we propose that funds be sought to establish an "information network" by placing information officers on the staffs of the state human relations councils. Many state council staffs and board members have indicated a need and desire for research and writing skills within their organizations. Provision of this need would tie in very well with a need to strengthen the research facilities of the SRC.

On the staffs of the participating councils the information officers would collect and compile precise data relevant to a wide variety of problems and issues, such as employment, public assistance, housing, school desegregation, etc. He would write special reports on state or local problems. He would respond to requests for information from journalists, government agencies, and scholars both inside and outside the state. He would provide information needed by other members of the councils staff for speeches, conferences, etc. He could assist local councils to find needed data. As a part of the agreement and as a natural outgrowth of the functions already mentioned he would respond to requests for information from the SRC Research Director for publications of regional scope.

Job descriptions and qualifications for the information officers would be agreed upon by the SRC and the officers and staffs of the state councils participating. In general, the information officers should be persons with a master's degree in economics, political science, sociology or journalism--or equivalent background in research and information techniques. They should have demonstrated skill in writing. Personnel would be recruited and retained with the stipulation that persons employed and their performance on the job be acceptable to both the state council concerned and the SRC.

Budget requirements, to be funded through the SRC, would be determined in the agreement in the light of the particular situation and the portion of support services which could be absorbed by the office of the council.

The SRC would need to hire a highly qualified research director to coordinate and provide advice and assistance for the efforts of this network of information officers, as well as to supervise the research department of the SRC.

The arrangement should include a provision that an information officer will be placed on a state council staff where at least an adequate office is maintained by the state council and one full-time employee is otherwise provided. As a standard, this would be an executive director, together with at least a part-time secretary. Minimally, it could be a full-time administrative secretary. Where this minimum requirement cannot be met an information officer might still be placed in the state, but would be employed directly by the Southern Regional Council under the supervision of SRC's research director in consultation with such state council leadership as does exist.

If the arrangement for this "information network" with the state councils works well, it might become the prototype for similar arrangements for other programs. It is our view that SRC programs should be planned so as to utilize the human relations councils to the fullest extent practical. A relationship to a constituency is important to the SRC as the growth of an interracial constituency is important to the South. By the same token, involvement in programs vital to the region is vital to the development of the human relations councils.

To the purpose just mentioned, a third suggestion is that all SRC field programs be coordinated under the departments of field activities

Future special projects should be placed, administratively, within the field department. Liaison with human relations councils would thus be enhanced. The administrative load of the executive director of SRC would be lightened.

A fourth suggestion, related to the third, is that at least one assistant to the field director be employed as soon as possible. Two might eventually be needed.

One obvious reason for this is that the administrative change proposed in suggestion three would require at least one assistant to the director of field activities for the general work with human relations councils which is now his chief responsibility.

A second reason, already mentioned, is that under the new arrangement some of the councils might not qualify for the "information network" arrangement or other programs which might be negotiated in the future--or might qualify only minimally, by maintaining an office and administrative secretary--and would need intensive cultivation from some source to organize and serve local councils, provide technical assistance for fund raising and membership enlistment, etc. Such functions could not be assumed by the proposed information officers. Yet the availability of a person to work in the state for extended periods of time might make the difference between continued weakness and eventual strength. One, two, or more persons, preferably without heavy family obligations, should be employed to work out of the SRC office specifically on these organizational tasks. The goal, of course, would be to build the strength of the human relations council to the point at which it could employ an executive director of its own, who would assume these functions.

A reorganization such as these suggestions comprise would give the SRC and the councils on human relations a closer, better-defined working relationship, which both it and they need. At the same time, it would both respect and encourage autonomy of the state councils. It would make for more responsible and, hopefully, more efficient administration of funds and programs by the SRC. It would make SRC's concern for the growth and strength of the human relations councils, if anything, more manifest and more effective--yet deal realistically with the reluctance of foundations to support continuously the general operations of organizations.

LESLIE W. DUNBAR,
EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

A Council to attain the ideals and practices of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South

MEMORANDUM

TO: State Council Presidents & Directors

FROM: Paul Anthony

We have just received word from the Ford Foundation of a grant of $100,000 per year for three years as additional support for our grant-in-aid program for the state councils.

We hope to have a meeting of Directors and Presidents shortly after the first of the year to discuss all of the SRC programs, cooperation in developing them, and, most importantly-how we will make use of these additional funds.

It is hardly desirable to do so in memo form, however, the need to convey the above news gives me an excellent opportunity to express to you all the very best wishes for the season from all of us here.

Mr. Will C. Allred
Executive Director

Dear Will:

Congratulations on the write up about your position paper in Trends in Housing. And thanks for sending me a copy.

Best regards,

Mr. Kenneth Dean

Dear Ken:

Enclosed is our check in the amount of $128.84 to cover the expenses outlined in your letter of February 5 for attendance by you and Mr. Hall at the Ford Foundation review in Atlanta, January 23. This includes the airfares for both at $51.87 each. $1.75 taxi fare for you, $1.35 parking for Mr. Hall, and $12.00 for his 150 miles of auto travel.

By all means Powell's travel to the Jackson airport should always be included in his expenses, as far as we are concerned. Actually, I am just sorry we can't legally pay him a more realistic mileage rate. He told me a little about the treatment he had received from his Conference because of his participation in human relations affairs. I don't see how he gets along on a "minimum salary appointment" at all -- and I certainly don't see how he does it without being bitter.

All is well, considering the circumstances,

Cordially,

Enclosure

Dear Ken:

Please add the following person to the membership list of the Atlanta chapter of NAIRO:

Mr. Robert Alexander
Room 161
50 Seventh Street, N.E.
Atlanta, Georgia 30323

Bob Alexander is a member of NAIRO who is on the staff of the HEW Civil Rights Regional office. He formerly was executive director of the Houston Council on Human Relations. He recently was moved from New Orleans to Atlanta and is eager to be active in NAIRO here.

Cordially,

Mr. Oscar McCloud

(interagency list)

Dear Oscar:

Attached is a copy of our bill from Paschals for the Southern Interagency Conference meeting, February 1-2.

As I have noted on the copy, I collected $20.00 from persons attending to help defray cost of the refreshments at the social hour. That leaves a balance due of $58.85.

~~If your office~~ I believe our agreement was that SRC would split that cost with your office. If your recollection is not to the contrary, we would appreciate your sending your half, payable to SRC, whenever you are good and ready.

Best regards,

A Few Directions

The guidelines explain actually about everything you will need to know. However just be sure that you have a written proposal that gives all the details required by the guide sheets before you send books.

The quantity of books to be sent to an organization has not been set. From what I can gather though it is something like about 500 an organization and no more than 3500 a state.

You may not special order less than 50 books. Anything below this quantity is too expensive. However for some reason you do not save by ordering more than 50 either.

From what I understand Harry Delung does not think less than 5 paperbacks of each copy should be sent. I think a greater variation of books with two or three of each being sent is better. Decide for yourself.

You will be dealing with Alvin Steingold at Atlanta News Agency. You may either place orders over the phone, by mail, or by going to the warehouse.

Dear Sue:

Thanks very much for the information on the Mississippi Conference which I have read with interest and appreciation for the work you are doing.

While I am sorry you will be leaving SSOC business for the next few months, the work in Washington does sound interesting and I hope it will provide you not only with a change but a chance for a little rest.

I look forward to a visit from Howard and Jody and welcome the opportunity to know as much as possible about what SSOC is doing.

I regret that a long standing commitment will take me out of town over the weekend and I will be unable to look in on the conference.

Thanks for the good words about NEW SOUTH.

All good wishes.

Sincerely,

Mr. Paul Anthony
Executive Director
Southern Regional Council

Dear Paul:

I'm sorry that we have been so out-of-touch lately. We will try to have someone at the next Interagency Council meeting.

I thought you might like to see the enclosed report on the conference SSOC sponsored in Mississippi on the weekend of February 25-27. We have really had some exciting results I think -- some interest by students at the white campuses, and even an insurgent newsletter by students at Millsaps.

Our southwide conference will be held this coming weekend, again at Old Gammon. I hope you will be able to come out for some of the sessions.

I plan to be leaving the SSOC office in about two weeks to spend the next few months at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington doing some study on southern history and perhaps a specific study of one of the southern urban centers. Howard Romaine, our Chairman for this year, will be working full-time through next December, and Jody Palmour, a former student at Emory has just taken over management of the office. I hope you'll be able to meet one or both of them soon.

Regards,

Sue Thrasher

P.S. I've read The New South from cover to cover and like the new format very much.

MISSISSIPPI 1966:

THE STUDENT PERSPECTIVE

A report of the statewide student conference held at Mount Beulah, the Delta Ministry Conference Center at Edwards, Mississippi, February 25-27, 1966. The conference was sponsored by the Southern Student Organizing Committee (SSOC). This report is submitted by Sue Thrasher, conference coordinator.

BACKGROUND

Since the summer of 1964, Mississippi has been a concentration point for a various number of organizations: The National Council of Churches Delta Ministry, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Congress of Racial Equality, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and at least three lawyers committees. In addition to these national groups, one of the more powerful organizations within the state is the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party which began organizing for the congressional challenge in the summer of 1964 and is now beginning to build strong local organizations. More recent developments in the state include the Mississippi Council on Human Relations, the Mississippi Democratic Conference (a coalition of labor and moderate democrats), the Mississippi Freedom Labor Union (formed by Negroes who went on strike for higher wages on the Delta plantations), and the Young Democratic Clubs.

In March of 1965, D Gorton, a former student at the University of Mississippi, attempted to set up a statewide conference. The conference was only partially successful in terms of student participation. However, it is difficult to assess the reasons why. However, it is interesting to note that five students from Mississippi College attended the meeting. (Mississippi College, a small Southern Baptist school had announced one day earlier that it would not accept federal funds in order to remain segregated.) Other students who were unable to attend the conference had expressed an interest in more statewide communication among liberal students.

In choosing areas of concentration for the year 1965-66, the Southern Student Organizing Committee (SSOC) decided to again attempt to have a student conference in Mississippi. The Mississippi conference was to be one of four regional meetings: University Reform in Arkansas, Appalachian Poverty in Kentucky and Tennessee, Race and Religion in Alabama, and the state conference in Mississippi. It was later decided to combine the Race and Religion conference with the one for Mississippi and to recruit students from both states.

PLANNING

In early January invitations to a planning meeting were issued to key campus contacts at Millsaps, Rust, Alcorn A & M, Mississippi Southern, Jackson State, Mississippi Industrial, Mississippi Valley State College, Coahoma Junior College, University of Mississippi, Mississippi State, and Mississippi State College for Women. Memorandums were also sent to representatives of the Mississippi Council on Human Relations and the National Council of Churches Delta Ministry.

The planning meeting was held on Saturday, January 8th at Tougaloo College. Attendance was surprisingly good in light of the fact that notices had gone out only one week in advance. Those attending the meeting were: Albert Garner, Henry Hunter, Seward Rogne, Milton Pickett, and Howard Spencer (Tougaloo College); Michael Gwin, Lee Makamson, David Doggett, and Gary Brooks (Millsaps); David Beckley, William Scott (Rust College); Lester James Smith (Mississippi Industrial College); Betty Carolyn Hill (Mississippi Valley State); and Colleen Cumming (University of Mississippi School of Nursing).

It was soon apparent that very few of the students had a great deal of interest in Race and Religion -- a rather worn out theme by now. An alternative outline for a broad educational conference was proposed and agreed upon. Possible topics were discussed and the following five were agreed on: The Church, Civil Rights, Politics, Economy, and the University. A preference list of speakers was drawn up with special care given to including various viewpoints on the above subjects.

Following the planning meeting, each student received a second memo with a tentative agenda enclosed informing them of the progress made in confirming speakers and securing facilities.

STUDENT RECRUITMENT

Contacts on Mississippi campuses were rather limited when work on the conference started. Some students we had been in touch with last year had graduated and moved away. However, at the three large predominantly white schools (Mississippi Southern, Mississippi State, and the University of Mississippi) we had some contacts as well as several of the Negro campuses (Rust, Alcorn A & M, Mississippi Valley State, Tougaloo, Jackson State).

Campus visits were made to: Rust College, Mississippi Industrial, Ole Miss, Coahoma Junior College, Mississippi State, Tougaloo, Jackson State, Delta State, Alcorn A & M, Prentis Institute. Students were contacted by phone or mail at Mississippi State College for Women, Mississippi Southern, Mississippi College, Millsaps, and Mary Holmes Junior College. At each campus visited, the pattern was to meet with people who had attended the planning meeting or people we had previously contacted. Often these students or professors would set up small meetings and invite other students. The groups had one common characteristic; they were all very small.

THE CONFERENCE

Total registration for the conference was seventy one. This included fifty students and six faculty members. Schools represented were: Rust College, Alcorn A & M, Mississippi Industrial, Jackson State, Tougaloo, Mississippi Valley State College, Mississippi State, Mississippi State College for Women, and Millsaps College. In addition to these Mississippi schools, students attended from Stillman College and Miles College in Alabama, and Fisk University and Tennessee A & I State in Nashville, Tennessee.

The program began on Friday evening with a discussion on "The Relevance of the Church". Clifton Whitley, chaplain at Rust College gave the principle address. He was followed by Mrs. Jane Schutt of the United Church Women and Rev. Fred Lowry of the NCC Delta Ministry. Rev. Lowry introduced the group to Mrs. Wilson who told of the plight of the Delta Negroes who are being pushed off the plantations by mechanization. These speakers were followed by a rather lengthy discussion of the social gospel. Although the group numbered about sixty persons before the evening was over, there was a surprising amount of participation in the discussion.

On Saturday morning a panel on Civil Rights was scheduled which included Kenneth Dean of the Mississippi Council on Human Relations, Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, Charles Evers of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and John Lewis of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Mr. Evers apparently had a last minute conflict and Mrs. Hamer was called away to North Carolina. However, John Lewis and Ken Dean provided a stimulating forum which revolved around the strategy of the civil rights movement. Issac Foster of the Mississippi Freedom Labor Union (MFLU) also gave some background on the formation of the MFLU and the strategies now being used in the Mississippi Delta by the Poor Peoples Conference.

The two Saturday afternoon sessions merged into one discussion on politics and economy. Claude Ramsey, state director of the AFL-CIO , and also associated with the Mississippi Democratic Conference opened the session. After a rather sharp questioning period, Mrs. Annie Devine, former congresswoman of the Freedom Democratic Party responded to Mr. Ramsey's remarks. This discussion was probably the most tension filled one of the entire meeting. It was also a very honest view of the political struggle now going on in the state.

Saturday night was spent in small group discussion, most of which centered around strategy for social change. Following these discussions, the films Danger on the Right, No Hiding Place, and The Streets of Greenwood were shown.

The Sunday morning session was devoted to a discussion of the University. Unfortunately, there was no student from a predominantly white state university represented on the panel. Howard Spencer, Tougaloo, Betty Hill, Mississippi Valley State, Tommy Richards, Alcorn A & M, Bill Scott, Rust College, and Lee Makamson, Millsaps, were the panelists. The discussion following their remarks was probably the best of the entire conference. The unfortunate thing was that the meeting had to close before there was ample time for discussion concerning university reform. Immediately following lunch, most of the students left to return to their campuses. Some students remained to talk with Issac Foster of the Mississippi Freedom Labor Union about the possibilities for work in the Delta.

EVALUATION

Perhaps the most glaring fault of the conference was that it attempted too much in the amount of time available. It was actually good when two of the speakers on Saturday morning did not appear -- and that discussion revolved around the viewpoints of two individuals rather than four. When one of the speakers was late on Saturday afternoon, it gave people a chance to relax and have a song-fest. The tight schedule also meant that discussion had to be cut off at several points, and there was very little opporutnity for small group discussions. However, the broad educational aspects of the conference may have been needed for such a "first" meeting. The value of such a meeting should be in the follow-up, i.e. smaller meetings (regional, perhaps) on the specific issues.

Perhaps the most educational value of the conference came as an aside-- in the form of thirteen Negro families who are now living at Mount Beulah. The families have spent most of their lives living and working on Delta plantations. Many of them were told to leave because they were being replaced by machines; others left because an opportunity to build a better life was opened to them through the formation of the Poor Peoples Conference. In meeting and talking with the plantation folk, students learned first hand of the blatant injustices of the "southern way of life." The twelve year old boy who had never been to school, the old gray haired man who sat quietly on the steps listening, and the anger of a young mother leveled at a Mississippi moderate -- all spoke very forcefully and perhaps provided the only real perspective of "Mississippi 1966."

RECOMMENDATIONS

Unless there is immediate follow-up in the state, the rapport stimulated by the conference will go for naught. I would suggest a series of "happenings" for the spring:

1. A short term work/study project during the spring holidays. Issac Foster suggested that students come to the Delta and see for themselves the condition there. Practical work could be done through the Mississippi Freedom Labor Union, the Poor Peoples Conference, or the Delta Ministry. Study sessions could revolve around mechanization and its effects on the Delta and what kinds of federal programs are needed to alleviate the situation. An alternative work/study plan could be worked out with the Freedom Democratic Party which would involve voter education and registration and some study concerning the politics of the state and the '66 elections.

2. Informational services. It is important that Mississippi students be informed of other activities in the South -- particularly Alabama. This can be done (somewhat) through special mailings by the SSOC office and distribution of the newsletter.

3. Maintenance of statewide communication. An excellent insurgent newspaper is how being published by students at Millsaps College. This needs to reach other students in the state.

4. Social Science Institute or Research Center. We should seriously consider the possibility of setting up something of this nature that would collect data and information concerning the social and economic trends of the area. For example, few students in the Delta area are aware of the extent that mechanization is effecting that region and the number of federal programs that are not being used because they are required to be non-discriminatory.

Perhaps I should make it clear that these programs should be directed only at Mississippi students. No doubt, students from other areas could benefit from something like the work/study, but priority should be given to students in the state.

MISSISSIPPI'S ECONOMICS

AND

MISSISSIPPI'S "NEW IMAGE"?

This paper was prepared for the Freedom Democratic Party by Mike Bruland. Mike has the Master of Arts degree from the University of Minnesota and is currently doing research on fair employment practices in Mississippi.

Reprinted for distribution by the Southern Student Organizing Committee (SSOC), Box 6403, Nashville, Tennessee, 37212

Many important people in Mississippi nowadays are concerned about "Mississippi 's Image." If one reads the newspapers, watches TV or listens to the radio, one always finds some businessman or politician expressing concern about "Mississippi's Image." So important is this image that it often forces businessmen and politicians to say things they would rather not say. Such is the case when on January 21, 1964, Governor Paul B. Johnson said in his inaugural address: "I would point out to you that the Mississippi economy is not divisible by party or faction, or even by race, color or creed. As a practical matter, we are at this moment in the mainstream of National light. National policies have a direct bearing on our economy, on our political freedom, on our daily living, whether we like it or not -- If I must fight it will not be a rearguard defense; it will be for our share of tomorrow." This very moderate statement was spoken after a bitter, racist campaign.

What is it that causes this concern about "Mississippi's Image?" Basically it is the fact that, whether it likes it or not, Mississippi needs money from the rest of the country for politicians to run the state and businessmen to make a profit. Mississippi talks about state's rights and the interference of the Federal Government, but the facts are that in recent years Mississippi has received more money from the Federal Government than it has paid out in taxes to it. Mississippi is trying desperately to get new industry to come to the state to provide more jobs for unemployed and underemployed people. Mississippi needs the tourists' dollars. Therefore, Mississippi is concerned about its image.

Immediately, a number of questions come up. What is behind "Mississippi's Image?" Is there really a "New Mississippi?" If so, how does it differ from the "Old Mississippi?" Have the people of Mississippi benefited from the changes that have taken place?

AGRICULTURE

Cotton is still the single most important crop in Mississippi, but things are changing; it is not nearly as important a crop as it was just 25 years ago. In 1961 the money received by the farmers of the state for selling cotton and cotton seed was only 45.5% of all the money earned by farmers by selling all kinds of crops. In 1940 the money received from selling cotton was 61.8% of the money made from selling all farm crops, including cotton. More and more cotton is being raised on only the large plantations of the Delta, where rich soil and more and more use of machinery like cotton pickers has resulted in larger and larger crops on less and less land. In 1940, 1 million more acres of cotton were planted than in 1960; but in 1960, because of the use of machines and fertilizer, much more cotton was harvested.

There are also fewer acres being planted in corn now than in 1940. In 1962 two million fewer acres of corn were planted than in 1940; also the total corn harvested was one-third less.

What agricultural products are taking the place of cotton and corn. The Answer is that although the number of acres of rice and soybeans is being increased in the Delta, most of the land not planted with corn or cotton has become pasture and woodland.

The greater amount of land in pasture shows that more and more cattle and poultry are being raised. In 1940 for every $100 made from selling farm products, $28 of it was made selling cattle and poultry. In 1960, though, for every $100 of farm products sold, $40 was made from selling livestock. In 1960, three times more beef cattle were sold, than in 1940 and five times more broilers were sold in 1960 than in 1940.

What is important to the people of Mississippi, particularly the Negroes, is the fact that less and less land is being planted with crops and more and more land is becoming pasture and woodland; and even more important, the greater use of machines and fertilizer in agriculture, have resulted in the loss of jobs. The Mississippi Economic Council's report, "Mississippi Agriculture and Forestry Trends and Prospects," talks about it this way:

> The substantial increase in farm output has been accomplished mainly through research and the adoption of a vast array of management and technological improvements. Many farmers and farm workers have left the farm. The 252,000 people employed on Mississippi farms and comprise less than half the 1940 number. The enormity of the increase in farm labor efficiency made possible through better management and technology is emphasized when we consider that Mississippi farms are now able to produce more than 1½ times the volume of their 1940 output with only 46% as many workers.

Perhaps an example taken from a report on the Mississippi Freedom Labor Union can help put these numbers into more human terms, to show what this means to human beings:

> What the Union is fighting is the rich farmer who operates his plantation like a huge, inhuman industrial corporation. Visitors from other countries come to Mississippi to see one of the world's largest plantations, the Delta Pine and Land Corporation, which owns more than 60 square miles of land in Bolivar County alone. They are amazed at how so few men can run so many acres so well with so few workers. Delta Pine and Land Corporation, owned in England, is typical of the way bigger and bigger farms are raising most of the crops in this country. From the civil war to about 1930 the large slave-owner's plantations were divided up among large numbers of sharecroppers. But since 1930 the number of Negro sharecroppers and renters has become smaller because farm land costs too much for poor people today -- $500 an acre. And there is very little land for sale. For the Negro, there is practically none at all.

Although the sharecropper has never been able to earn enough to feed and house his family in the Delta, he at least lived on and farmed some land. In a sense, the land was his to work, though not to own. But for the day laborer, this was never true. For him, the corporation is his boss man and his works for him on a day-to-day basis, without security, without tenure, without rights of any kind. The important change that has come about is that most of the Negroes in this part of the state are day laborers, without money, without property, without anything except today's piece of bread and lard. In the wealthy of America today the Negro day laborer has no share. And with the use of more and more machinery he is rapidly becoming permanently without a job, for there is no need for him.

For years the Negro day laborer has received $2.50 or $3.00 for ten hours or more work a day -- in Shaw there has been talk about the wages going down to a $1.75 a day -- and it looks like even this amount will soon be gone. These facts lead to some very, very important questions: First of all, what can these people who are losing their jobs do to change what appears to be a future without a job, housing and food? W What can the MFLU do? What can the MFDP do? Is there any hope at all?

MANUFACTURING

In 1940 about 12 of every 20 workers were working in agriculture,, but by 1960 only four of every 20 workers were working on farms. At the same time, in 1940 about two of every 20 workers worked in industry. By 1960, four of every 20 workers worked in industry. The fact that more and more people are working in industry is more important in this state now than in 1940. This increase in industry is not so important because more people are being employed than in 1940, but because it means that Mississippi is more dependent on the rest of the United States.

Mississippi needs the rest of the country because she needs money from outside the state to buy new products. This is why the state officials are worried about "Mississippi's Image." If the bombings, beatings, demonstrations and the Congressional Challenge continue, industries will not want to come to Mississippi, and people around the country will not buy Mississippi products or come and spend money as tourists in the state. This concern in Mississippi and with "Mississippi's Image" can be seen in a recent aritcle by a columnist in the Jackson Clarion-Ledger: "Yessir, industrialists who are coming to Mississippi say they are proud to come here. To them, the image of our state is such that they are willing and ever eager to stake their future with us."

Both the state and local governments, along with the Mississippi Economic Council, have made tremendous efforts to obtain more manufacturing plants. Aside from advertising the advantages for new industry in their state and local areas, an important part of their effort to get industry to Mississippi has been the Balance Agriculture With Industry Program (BAWI). Under the BAWI program any particular community may look for and attempt to bring in an industry that they want by promising to give the industry a place to build and/or buildings in which to set up, and promising that the new industry will not have to pay certain taxes that in most states they would have to pay. If a company agrees, the community may hold an election to determine whether or not the bonds to pay for the place and/or the building for the new industry should be sold. For the bond issue to pass two-thirds of all the qualified voters who vote at the election must vote for the bond issue.

Needless to say very few Negroes in the state can vote for any bond issue, but they do have to pay the increased taxes need to pay for the bond issue. A result of not being able to vote on the bond issue will be talked about later in this section. In addition to the issuance of bonds, state law permits city governments to let new and expanding firms avoid paying any taxes on their property for a period of ten years. Furthermore, when the city or county government pays for the construction of a new building or buildings for a new industry, the industry does not have to pay taxes as long as the city or county government owns the building. Therefore, in many cases the community not only pays for the building in which the factory is housed, but also the industry does not have to pay any taxes for anything else, like new schools and city improvements, and the people pay the cost of the industry plus all other city expenses.

Now, the question may be asked: Has the BAWI program done what it set out to do? To a certain extent it probably has. Certainly new industry has moved into Mississippi since the program started; however, how much of this came because of the BAWI program is difficult to say. When 1500 factory owners that had just moved into the South were asked what had made them decide to move, it was found that the officials of these companies felt fourteen things were more improtant to them than low taxes and financial aid (e.g. labor supply, market, raw materials, etc.) when they were deciding where to put new plants.

To what extent have the people benefited from the program? Jobs have been provided; however, most of the companies that have used the BAWI program are clothing, textile, or furniture and electrical fixture companies, all of which are kinds of industry that pay low wages. Moreover, the Negro people have not received as many benefits from the BAWI program as the white people. In 1960, only twelve of every 100 of the employed Negro men were working in industry. Furthermore, more than one half of the Negro men who were working in industry were working in the kinds of companies that pay the lowest wages -- furniture, lumber and wood product companies.

This leads to some very important questions: What might happen to the BAWI program if Negroes were allowed to vote? Should the Freedom Democratic Party work to eliminate the BAWI program? Are there ways of providing work for people and still have industry help pay the taxes that the people pay all of now? What are some of the methods that can be used in getting more and better jobs for Negroes in the manufacturing plants? What will be the effect of the increased use of machines rather than men on the problem of more and better jobs?

INCOME

In 1929 in Mississippi most people earned $510 or less in a year, and this amount was less than ½ of what most people in the rest of the country earned in one year. By 1962 in Mississippi most people earned $1259 in a year, which was a little more than one half of what the people in the rest of the country made. Most of the increase in income earned in the rest of the United States was done during World War II. At the end of World War II, Mississippi had a per capita income of almost $1000 a year, which was about one half of what most of the rest of the people in the country earned in a year.

While per capita income in Mississippi went from $500 to almost $1000 in the 15 years between 1929 and 1944, it has grown to only $1240 a year since 1944. This means that the amount of money that most people in Mississippi made in a year increased almost $500 from 1929 to 1944, but in the years since 1944, the amount of money most people in Mississippi made in a year increased only about $250. This information from the Mississippi Economic Council's Booklet, "A Blueprint for Mississippi's Economic Progress" clearly shows that the income of most of the people in the state is not growing larger; income for the people in the rest of the country has grown a great deal while Mississippi's has not. In fact, if the poor, unemployed Negro farm workers had not moved to the northern cities in search of jobs, their tragically low pay would have meant the state would be even poorer than it is now.

It is mostly because of the low farm income that Mississippi has remained so much poorer than the rest of the United States. However, even in industry the wages are much lower than the rest of the nation. In 1963 the usual wage paid per hour for production workers in manufacturing was $1.73 and the normal wages in the rest of the country were $2.46 per hour. A booklet published by the Mississippi Power and Light Company tries to explain the low wages in Mississippi by saying that it is cheaper to live in Mississippi than in other parts of the country. The booklet says:

> " . . . we in Mississippi do not feel that the prevailing wage rates indicate cheap labor. When all factors behind the cost of living are considered, it is felt that the rates are adequate. Some of these factors are: With plenty of garden space, gardens will be found at practically every home supplementing cash income. The cost of rent or the construction cost of a home is less because the same labor costs going into construction is less and the type of construction costs less. Storm windows, basements, and large heating systems are not necessary in this mild climate. Abundance of electricity, natural gas, and water at economical rates. With natural recreational facilities the year-round, this item is also inexpensive. Rural labor will usually consist of wives, sons and daughters of farmers living on the farm and working in the plant. To these families the wages of the plant workers are supplementing farm income and in most cases will mean extra dollars over and above the accustomed existence. Rural labor pool their own transportation and this item is less costly than in large industrial centers."

The above statement reveals two things which have caused the low wages paid in the manufacturing companies. First of all, Mississippi has a large number of very poor farm families from which to get people who are willing to work for very little money because it is all they can get. This cheap labor, together with the BAWI program, has helped to attract the large number of industries which pay low wages into the state. The second reason that wages are low is that most parts of the state are very much against labor unions being organized. This feeling has caused laws like the Right to Work law to be passed in the state legislature. If people were allowed to organize labor unions they could strike and get higher wages. The fact that Mississippi does not like unions, that they want low wages, and that they are proud that the state has poor unions and low wages, is shown by the following statement by the Mississippi Agricultural and Industrial Board, which the governor is the president of:

> "Mississippi has lost a smaller portion of the total working time because of labor strikes and has had fewer strikes and fewer workers involved in strikes relative to employment than the average state in other areas and in the nation. These facts indicate that Mississippi has had labor-management relations which are above average."

The last statement is not true: what these facts do show is that workers are not allowed to organize in Mississippi, and the result is that employers and owners can pay low wages without worrying about the workers getting together to complain.

In 1959, one half of the people in Mississippi made $1204 a year or less; however the usual income per year for white people was $2028, while the Negro average was $724 a year. These facts clearly show that Negroes, for the most part, have not received any benefits from what little industry has come into Mississippi. The Negro men can only get jobs in agriculture, private households -- which includes gardners, chauffeurs, etc. -- and the most menial and lowest paying jobs in industry -- like janitors. The Negro women can only get jobs as maids, cooks and housekeepers, and some jobs on farms. The facts are that there are not even enough decent jobs for the white workers. Therefore, the Negro workers holding poor jobs threaten the white workers, and businessmen and politicians have used this fact to prevent the poor Negroes and poor whites from getting together and working to improve conditions in the state of Mississippi.

This leads to some very important questions: What can be done to increase job opporutnities for Negroes in Mississippi? What can the Freedom Democratic Party do to improve working conditions and increase income? Will it ever be possible for the poor Negroes and poor whites in Mississippi to work together to "overcome" those politicians and businessmen that exploit them both? Is so, how can this be done?

TAXATION

A brief comment on the tax system of Mississippi will further reveal how the politicians and businessmen and the system they work in takes advantage and cheats the people. The facts are that most of the taxes that are paid are not paid by the corporations or wealthy individuals that can most afford them, but upon those families and persons that are poorest and have the least amount of money. The BAWI program has already been described, and it has been shown how the local taxes are not paid by wealthy corporations, but that the people in the community pay the taxes for the industries. Furthermore, some of the communities which have paid for industries in their towns have greatly weakened their ability to borrow money by borrowing too much to pay for industries that do not even pay taxes to help the city pay off its debts. This means that it may be difficult to seal future issues of bonds to pay for new school buildings or other improvements. No wonder this state has such a poor school system.

The fact that the taxes are paid by people who can least afford them can be seen in the following statement in a booklet on government and tax policy put out by the Mississippi Economic Council:

> "Tax policy in Mississippi has, of course, been affected by the relatively low income of the people. It has been necessary to take a relatively higher percent of aggregate income for taxes in order to finance necessary government improvements,

In less complicated language, this means that people in Mississippi have to pay more of what they earn for taxes because the people in the state do not make enough, or as much as people in other states.

> Certain classes of taxpayers, however, have been taxed less heavily than similar classes in a majority of other states. These classes include homeowners and persons in middle and upper-income brackets. Other important features of tax policy include heavy reliance on consumptive and provision of tax inducements for industrial location."

Again, the people who make the least amount of money are responsible for more than their share of the taxes.

> The general sales and use tax-accounting for about one half of the state general fund revenues has been the most important source of tax revenue. Other state taxes, ranked according to revenue yield in fiscal year of 1960 are motor fuels, corporation taxes, tobacco tax, oil and gas severence, and individual income."

One question stands out from all these facts: What should be the Freedom Democratic Party position on how people and industries are taxed, and what does the FDP feel is fair taxing.

SUMMARY

The politicians and usinessmen talk about "Mississippi's Image"; they continually refer to a "New Mississippi." But is it any different from the Old Mississippi? The only possible answer to that question is No. The ways people are kept poor may be more hidden and harder to understand than before; it may look like a good system on the surface; it may seem to provide more for the people of the state--new factories, new highways, new schools, new buildings --but basically it is the same old Mississippi. What can be done to change all of this?

When Southerners Unite To Save Their Region

By S. Clark Woodroe

The "old South" is dead. The Negro revolt has sounded the knell, and the Civil Rights and Voting Rights Acts have mobilized the machinery of the Federal Government to insure that the old order of agrarian feudalism and Negro serfdom will never return. In some areas the rhetoric of eulogy lingers; but even the most vehement defenders of white supremacy cannot help but know they are praying over a ghost.

What will supplant the dead system remains an open question. The South has inherited a twofold legacy. On the one hand, it suffers from poverty, especially among Negroes, a lack of educational facilities, an agrarian indifference to intellectual values, social immobility and stratification, ingrained prejudices, and a general damn-the-world attitude of resistance to change. On the other hand, it has its singular virtues, perhaps best summed up in the peculiarly Southern concept of "Christian love": a largely unconsious harmony of mind with other minds and with nature; an instinctive consideration of interpersonal sensitivities often drowned out in the North by harsh "realism" and factuality; a capacity to convey feelings and impressions without ever saying them; and, in its standard of "gentlemanliness", an exalted, if very personal, ideal of the dignity of man. This inheritance raises the glimmering possibility of a new Athenian polis. It also carries the danger of rigor mortis.

At such a juncture the attitudes and activities of students are critical. If Southern society is to make a synthesis between what is worthwhile in its legacy and what is required by change, the age-group now maturing must play a significant role. The bridge between the agrarian and the industrialist, the conservative-paternalistic and the egalitarian, the organicist and the logical-positivist can be built only by those who have some youthful flexibility of mind. Whether the potential of this flexibility bears fruit in terms of creative solutions to Southern problems, or whether the energy of young white Southerners is dissipated in fruitless adolescent reaction against an America which seems alien, depends in large measure upon student activities and educational processes at Southern universities. The question here is not one of "Yankees" indoctrinating Southerners in "foreign" values; it is one of Southerners themselves developing ways of preserving their region as a viable, if changing, social organism.

Apart from SNCC and the sit-in movement (which involved few Southern students from the governing white strata), student activities towards conscious social goals have been quite limited in the region until recently. Recognizing this gap, a group of student leaders and representatives met in Nashville in April, 1964 and formed the Southern Student Organizing Committee (SSOC). Originally formed to work among white students, it has extended its range to emcompass Negro campuses as well. With a mailing list of 3,500 interested participants, it is the largest group in its particular field.

Southerners tend to be more concerned with practical issues than with abstractions. SSOC shares this characteristic; it displays practically none of the ideological haggling which so often troubles left-wing groups. Insofar as SSOC has a governing ideology, it tends to parallel that of Students for a Democratic Society. While the group's primary focus has been on the race issue, it sees race as only one of a number of interrelated problems stemming from a fundamental malise in American society—the lack of "participatory democracy." Its formal statement of educational objectives gives an idea of its scope—its concern for a "new South which is democratic, integrated, and responsive to the needs of all its people, and . . . all 'issues' which vitally affect our society (e.g., human rights, economic opportunity, peace, and democratic politics)."

SSOC officials feel some distress at the organization's lack of ideological clarity. "Most Southern radicals," explains Howard Romaine, the University of Virginia graduate student who is president of the group, "are religious radicals. They tend to work only on concrete, black-and-white issues. Intellectual radicals are more broad-based. Our problem is how to go from moral-religious radicalism into a more social-critical approach."

Consequently, SSOC endeavors to provide students with a "radicalizing experience" which cuts through conventional limitations of thought and leads them to see their society in a new perspective. "We would like to relate the problems of society to the campus in a more dramatic way," Romaine declares. "What is needed is to bring back the excitement of the sit-ins." Nothing has arisen to create that level of emotion; but SSOC has brought students to work among the poor and to see for themselves how society operates upon the disadvantaged.

'White Southern students have taken an interest in transforming their society along Utopian lines'

One example of how SSOC seeks to accomplish its goals is the Southside Virginia project. Like most SSOC-inspired community activities, it is sponsored by a local group, the Virginia Students' Civil Rights Committee. Drawing upon the advice of experienced leaders from SNCC and other established civil rights organizations, a group of students went into several southern Virginia "Black Belt" counties in the summer of 1965. Much of their work centered around voter registration and testing the provisions of the Civil Rights Act. In addition, they compiled research reports about conditions in each county and on the impact of Federal farm programs. One participant, evaluating the project, declared he didn't think it did much to change the counties' basic social structure; but he said the experience was valuable for two reasons: first, it enabled students to reach the local people and learn their needs with the possibility of bringing change in the future, and second, it was likely to stir the students to seek reforms in their own colleges and universities when they returned.

Most SSOC-related community projects follow the same pattern. The idea is to get students into poor areas, involve them in concrete work (voter registration, education, building community centers, etc.), give them a new perspective on society, and hopefully cause changes for the better among the poor. While some enterprises, such as the Southside Virginia project, involve an entire summer, others are much shorter in duration. Over Christmas vacation, 1964, thirty-eight volunteers from seventeen southern colleges and universities participated in a project at Hattiesburg and Meridian, Mississippi. The volunteers remodeled community centers, helped in voter canvassing, and talked with civil rights leaders from the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party and the Council of Federated Organizations. The work done was hardly spectacular; but for the average Southern white student, seeing the racial issue from the Negro's perspective is a unique and highly educational experience.

In many ways, the community work done by SSOC closely parallels that of SNCC. SSOC has always maintained close ties with SNCC, but feels that its operations differ in two respects. First, SNCC is a primarily Negro organization with Negro leadership, while SSOC was founded as a primarily white organization with white leadership, and is evolving into a fully integrated group. Secondly, SSOC leaders feel that SNCC has become so involved in community work that it has almost completely abandoned its ties with campuses, white and Negro. SNCC has become, in SSOC's view, primarily a group of full-time community organizers. SSOC remains fundamentally a student organization, whose objectives include community work, but which uses community work as a device to educate full-time students.

As a student-centered organization, SSOC has devoted much of its energies to coordinating and stimulating university reform and social thought on campus. Unlike the Northeast, and lately the West, the South has no tradition of campus radicalism. In the South, one goes to college not so much to acquire habits of critical thought as to assimilate the standards of one's forefathers and the social mores of one's peers. The primary experience is social, not intellectual. To offset this situation, SSOC has engaged in such undertakings as sponsoring a tour by Steve Weissman, a Free Speech Movement leader and a Florida native, to speak on the implications of FSM for Southern campuses. The SSOC newsletter acts as a clearinghouse of reports on academic freedom and radical efforts at a large number of schools. Through its staff, consisting of an executive secretary and campus travelers, SSOC seeks to keep various local groups informed of each others' doings, to encourage exchange of ideas, to promote solidarity and enhance morale.

Central to the group's activities as a coordinating committee are workshops and conferences. Usually sponsored by educational institutions or foundations, these meetings seek to assemble the most active and socially aware students for discussions with each other and with academic and political authorities. Most SSOC projects spring from ideas developed at these conferences. SSOC ran a pre-Christmas workshop at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington. At this gathering, participants discussed such questions as: Is the South an underdeveloped region? Is there a significant movement on the Southern campus? If so, what is it for? Are Southern universities turning out an elite for an elitist economy?—and so on.

While SSOC's operations have been remarkably successful in the year and a half since it was founded, the organization is still confronted with thorny problems. The first, of course, is money; there isn't enough. The second is the draft, which makes it hard for students to leave college for political activities or community organizing. Other problems are more abstract. As Romaine notes in the November issue of the group's newsletter, SSOC is torn between taking a multi-issue orientation as a general radical group and concentrating on the civil rights question. The officers and staff are upset, for example, about the situation in Vietnam, but do not know exactly what to do about it. Concentrating on racial problems may be too narrow, but attacking a multitude of issues on all fronts might spread resources too thin. A related problem, as noted earlier, is the need to develop a new, more sophisticated critique of American society. Finally, the group's loose structure has led to a lack of cohesion. Romaine tends to favor a tighter structure, perhaps with individual memberships, to avoid dispersion to the point of dissolution.

What does SSOC portend for the "New South" which must be erected on the grave of the old? An easy answer would be to say that it portends nothing—that it is just another small group of student radicals beating their hearts out while the world pursues its accustomed dreary course. This is a threatening possibility; SSOC leaders despair over the obliviousness of most students, and they have abandoned any romantic hope that the region will regenerate itself spontaneously as a result of religious ideals. "You can only change society by power," Romaine contends, adding that the only hope of generating enough power is to organize those who have nothing to lose. Such organization has, so far, been close to nonexistent.

Yet in broader perspective SSOC's work is a cause for optimism among those who share its hopes. For the first time in recent memory, white Southern students have taken an interest in transforming their society along Utopian lines. Their ideology, stemming as it does from the "Northern," urban orientation of SDS, has a strange ring to Southern ears, and may, as presently expressed, hamper SSOC in relating its ideas to the thinking of most Southerners. But these differences are perhaps more a matter of expression than of content. SSOC is dissatisfied with modern industrial capitalism; the South has traditionally been hostile to that system. Jefferson's ideas of local democracy and the dignity of the individual, revered in the South, are quite close to the concepts of "participatory democracy" and equality. To treat a man as a gentleman is to treat him as an equal in all respects. "Christian love" is much the same as brotherhood and fraternity. If SSOC can overcome the prejudices and mental barriers erected by slogans and catchwords, and can reach the living feelings and thoughts which underlie forms of expression, it may well find in the South a radical dissatisfaction with things as they are, hidden now under a cloak of black reaction, but ready to be tapped to form a "new South" which would be a model for the world.

As a nonprofit organization, the Southern Student Organizing Committee depends on voluntary contributions for its continued existence. The best way to insure the continuity of its program is by the personal monthly pledges of supporters. You should know that:

 $5 will pay to send a year's subscription of the SSOC newsletter to a southern student.

 $10 a week will pay subsistence wages for a SSOC community worker.

 $20 a week will support a SSOC campus traveler.

 $100 will pay travel expenses for 20 Mississippi students to attend a statewide SSOC conference.

 $150 will pay the publishing expenses for one monthly edition of the SSOC newsletter.

All contributions are tax-exempt.

BUILDING A MOVEMENT

Before you get into the important parts of this month's New South Student, I would like to say a few things about building a movement of southern students, which is, after all, what SSOC is all about. Specifically, I would like to discuss one of the necessary ingredients to the building of such a movement.

Several months ago a benefactor from the North gave SSOC a good bit of financial support which when combined with foundation support and miscellaneous contributions meant that we were able for the first time to initiate programs on a large scale. Most of that money is gone now and the rest will be by the middle or end of the summer. With it SSOC expanded staff from four to sixteen, supported four SSOC related campus-community projects, sponsored two regional conferences, supported campus travellers in seven states, coordinated two South-wide protest programs, sponsored one South-wide conference, put out five issues of the New South Student, and distributed a variety of literature. We will have spent something like $15,000 in the past six months. Most of you have seen this money at work.

Although SSOC programs have reached several hundred southern students, it is important to realize that the job is just beginning to be done. We must expand programs in the fall. This will require a lot of work over the summer. Some of the proposed programs are a series of foreign policy workshops, more state campus travellers, a long range students and labor project, increased support to campus-community projects, and white community work. To implement these and other programs we must have, among other things, increased financial support.

From the beginning SSOC has pretty much relied on the North for money. We will continue to look North, but we must realize that support from the North will not be enough and that in fact it will probably decrease because of the increased activity up there.

We must begin to support our own programs. There are many sympathetic persons in the South who will support us. We must seek these people out and ask them to help. Also, there is a basic point which must be considered. We must have dependable support which will not be alienated as we develop programs which deal in a fundamental way with the problems of the South. The only group we can depend on for that support is our own constituency - you. Most, perhaps two thousand of you, are southern students. Many of the rest of you are related to the southern campus as professors, campus ministers, or recent college graduates. Almost all of you are able to support the building of a wouthern student movement. Some of you are already doing so. However only about five per cent of you support this newsletter financially. I can think of few students in the South who could not afford to pledge one dollar a month. Most professors could pledge five dollars a month.

We all must consider what it will take to build a student movement and what this will mean to the South. It will take more than your physical involvement and moral support. It will take your financial support as well. This is not something that would be nice or help a little. It is absolutely necessary.

MEETING AT BUCKEYE COVE

by Jody Palmour

The South is an underdeveloped, exploited area plagued by poverty, ignorance, and distrust. We have little more than the beginnings of an organized, popular politics, Southern students have seemed most prepared to build the required political movement that would free the South from the national problems so grotesquely caricatured in our land.

SSOC wants to help co-ordinate isolated, often times individual, efforts into a southern liberation front that will revolutionize our society, both economically and culturally, through comprehensive, non-violent programming. We will not be seduced into becoming like the carbon monoxide, ghetto North.

What We Gonna Do About It?

SSOC ain't gonna do nuthin. The peoples is. And we're calling a metting--the revolutionary council--to map out plans for the people's taking power in the South. We're inviting active student types to come to a camp in Buckeye Cove near Ashville, North Carolina on June 6 through 10 to report on what they have done this year, what their resources and plans are for next year.

SSOC staff members will present their analysis of where the South now stands and will offer concrete proposals of program and strategy. Delegates will offer their own proposals and the conference as a whole will decide on implementation for the coming year.

Resource People

In addition to you, we are inviting resource people to offer programs or general areas of concern they think we should work on. They will be talking about the relation of foreign policy programming to the domestic issues before the movement; radical education projects to create intellectually critical, radical professions and disciplines of study; the potential of full community organizing around labor unions; the role of nationalistic or racist sentiment during crucial stages of revolutionary development; the possibilities and models for white organizing in the South; and the meaning of radical art and the part it has played in human development.

The outside resource people will have approximately two hours to address the whole group. After each of their talks there will be a panel with the speaker and four or five representatives of the people who have been working on programs related to his proposal. We will contact delegates in advance so they can accept assignments and do preparatory thinking.

Delegates

The conference is not to be like the one in Atlanta where we were trying to do two incompatible things at the same time. We brought together both long time movement people and those just beginning an apolitical, moral protest against their society. SSOC, the movement, has a real responsibility for both groups of people. This meeting is for those already commited to building a political movement in the South.

Those individuals who are consciously building movements of people to change their own social environment are urged to come to this meeting. Eligibility does not imply that you are the head of a many-legged political machine about to devour all that stand in your way.

We want people who recognize the political and human need to build in the South a land where men are made neither slaves nor owners of slaves.

Things to Bring

The most important thing to bring is a thorough analysis of your own local situation, plus firm demands to make of SSOC for your own work, You might also need to bring sleeping bags, flashlights, axes, lawnmowers, fishing tackle, notebook and pencil. (We plan in the off hours to experiment with the CCC notion of organizing the poor.)

The staff has done mush planning for this meeting. We think it could spell the beginnings of a new effectiveness in the southern movement. Personal planning about one's home community work is essential to a regional conference such as this. We've got to work setting it up, as you do to prepare for it.

If you want to come but can't, we'll send copies of a comprehensive report of the proceedings if you are concerned enough to write out your accomplishments this year and what your plans are for next year.

We have to make assignments and logistical plans, so let us know in the mail tonight if you're coming. We need your phone number and where you can be reached by mail before the beginning of the conference. The buck is passed to you, Baby.

SUMMER PROJECTS

The following are three possibilities for summer work. The list is not by any means complete but simply represents projects the SSOC staff are familiar with and feel would be of particular interest to you.

THE MISSISSIPPI FREEDOM DEMOCRATIC PARTY

The MFDP is recruiting southern students to work in voter registration, adult education, etc., for the summer. Southern Negro students will get first preference; southern whites are next in priority. You need to hurry and write on this. Write to the MFDP, 507½ Farish Street, Jackson, Miss., or to SSOC.

NORTHERN COMMUNITY ORGANIZING WITH ERAP

Five ERAP projects plan summer projects which are open to students. For instance in Cleveland there will be programs around Welfare, Community Psychiatry, Journalism, Law, Theater, Children, and Photography. This includes projects in both poor white and Negro areas. Indicate what experience you have had, what program interests you, whether you can raise $200 subsistence, and whether you can visit Cleveland for a day or so before the summer, in a letter to the Cleveland Project, 2908 Jay St., Cleveland 13, (216-781-3739). The other project addresses are: Join, 4533 N. Sheridan Rd., Chicago; Newark Community Union, 471 Clinton Ave., Newark, N.J.; Boston Project, c/o Larry Gordon, 10 Brookford St., Dorchester, Mass.; Hill Neighborhood Union, 605 Congress Ave., New Haven, Conn. 06519.

STUDENTS AND LABOR PROJECTS IN CAROLINAS

SSOC will coordinate over the summer a project to involve students in labor organizing in the Upper South. This program grew out of the Students and Labor conference held last month in Durham.

Plans for the project are not yet complete. The program may involve around eight students working in several union situations with a basic salary and expenses covered by the labor movement. If this is not possible a smaller number of students will work in two or possibly three locations living on basic subsistence.

One of the probable locations is the Durham area where students would work to assist the campaign of service employees at Duke. This would involve both traditional union activity and community organizing joined together. Another may be semi-rural textile and packinghouse plants which have bitterly fought unions in the past. For more information write SSOC. Please write as soon as possible.

DELTAS: MISSISSIPPI AND VIETNAM

by Howard Romaine

Some of us in SSOC feel that there is a connection between what is going on in Vietnam and American actions in Santo Domingo, and that they reveal very basic traits of our foreign policy. We feel that these are not mistakes, but are merely examples of a new American imperialism that is very threatening to the movement for social change we are trying to build here in America, as well as in direct contradiction to the values which have led us into the movement. Many of us wonder if we would not be the "Communists" who are being bombed or kept out of office by the marines if we were doing similar work in an underdeveloped country.

Because of these questions which have come to most of our minds, we have tried to read and relate what is going on in these countries to what we have experienced here in the South. Some of the people who speak loudest and hardest about defending "freedom" in Vietnam are the very same people who own mile after mile of plantation land where black people are still not allowed to vote, and are hardly even allowed to eat. When the most vigorous spokesmen for the War are people like Stennis and Eastland of Mississippi, Long of Louisiana, and Thurmond of South Carolina, we cannot help but wonder what they mean by defending "freedom" in Asia. When these people speak in their home states about defending "freedom" against "Communist subversion," we know they are talking about us and what we are trying to do. So when we see our President embrace a little man in Hawaii who talks very much like a little man that happens to be Governor of Alabama, and when we read that most of the support for the Saigon government comes from big landowners and profiteers who sound very much like the plantation owners in the Deep South and their accomplices, the company stores, then we develop very gut feelings about which side we're on.

But it is not enough to know which side we're on. So that you all can think some of these things over this summer, if you're interested, I've prepared a list of some topics concerning our foreign policy. If you can read nothing else, I hope you'll at least get hold of Vietnam by Gettleman ($.65 from SSOC), the Vietnam Reader by Raskin and Fall ($1.75 from SSOC) a subscription to and back issues from Viet Report, and subscription to I.F. Stone's Weekly. A complete copy of the recommended reading list is available free from SSOC.

BLACK CONSCIOUSNESS

by Ed Hamlett

Pensacola Beach, Fla.-- A bunch of white folks from New Orleans, Nashville, and Ala. are here to talk about white community organizing. The informal meeting was called by people in New Orleans who gave up their apartments to black folks for a weekend meeting to talk about Black Consciousness.

I said BLACK CONSCIOUSNESS, not BELOVED COMMUNITY. Movement people in the South don't talk about the latter so much anymore. They're less idealistic (some would say less naive) than they used to be. The reasons for the dampening of idealism are not difficult to discover: Some restaurants open to middle-class Negroes (lower-class white places remain off-limits); A few hundred thousand newly registered voters-- with the same old "Segs" running and winning; a few thousand Negro kids in previously all-white schools--learning about the blessings of the white man's civilization, white history, and white accomplishments; and the vast majority of the other Negro kids in all-black, still inferior, white-controlled schools-- and they learn about the white man too, in many cases from textbooks discarded by whites years ago.

THE MOVEMENT'S BELOVED COMMUNITY

But, you protest, the Beloved Community was to have been built first within the Movement, if not immediately in the larger society. So what about that "band of brothers and circle of trust"? The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (Snick), which is what I'm talking about mainly, has always had whites on its staff. They were there initially for at least two reasons: 1)To demonstrate in the South that whites and Negroes could work togehter under any circumstances to build the "Beloved Community"; and, 2)To utilize their vitially needed skills and labor. The first two whites were from the South; soon northern Negroes and whites came in to work. In early days there was a good deal of talk about and feeling for the Beloved Community, which, everyone hoped, was being built. Victories came frequently.

ONE THOUSAND WHITE YANKS

In the fall of 1963 it was discovered in the Freedom Vote campaign in Mississippi that the presence of northern whites in fairly large numbers brought protection to the work from the federal government, that it had never given to black workers Additionally, because Snick had all but deserted its early black campus base, Negroes could not be recruited in sufficient numbers to meet the projected personnel needs for the work in voter registration, freedom schools and general community organizing. Thus, the call went out for 1,000 northern volunteers to help open up Mississippi in the summer of 1964. By the previous spring many local Negroes had begun to carry on the day-to-day work of their own freedom organizations--doing mimeographing, typing, and leg work. And then the volunteers came. They were more "efficient" in almost every way. They meant well; they tried hard; they had been invited to come; but some of the hosts soon has second thoughts.

BENEFIT OR LIABILITY?

Nevertheless, most of those involved will admit that the volunteers were instrumental in helping to secure the basic rights of blacks to organize, picket and vote. But, the "flood" of whites produced serious problems. It took almost a year for local participation in daily work to be built up again. Antagonisms between local, black staff and white volunteers produced psychological damage to some in both groups that was slow to mend, if at all. Whether the above advances could have been accomplished by blacks alone, thus avoiding the liabilities of white participation, is a question which can never be answered.

WHITE WORKERS NOW

I stated earlier that there were intially two primary reasons for white participation in Snick:1)To demonstrate that blacks and whites can work together to build the Beloved Community; and, 2) To secure needed skills. It is now clear to most people in the South that the first is true. With regard to the second, the vital functions of typing, printing, and research can be done, and in many cases now are being done, by Negroes. It is agreed that those whites who are still performing these tasks can do the Movement a valuable service by training local people to perform them.

If these reasons for white involvement are no longer important, what about the other,past justifications? To give protection? No. To help secure the right to leaflet and to demonstrate?--No. Are there new justifications? Many blacks say that there are absolutely none; in fact, some say that for whites to remain would be extremely detrimental. And here we must look at the question of Black Consciousness, and what it is.

WHAT IS BLACK CONSCIOUSNESS?

Blacks, all blacks, must be aware that they are not inferior to whites. They must know that black people have made significant contributions to world civilization over the centuries, including here in the United States. It is their being aware that whites, in many cases, are bad judges of the value of these contributions. It is their being conscious that even the English language is, at times, inherently inadequate for describing Africans or Afro-Americans, their achievements and culture. (Check Roget's Thesaurus for synonyms for "black," then look at those for "white.") And it is more. It is not only having facts and knowledge about history, and sociological statistics, etc.; it is also believing and feeling in one's GUTS that they are true. For example, the Negroes in Wilcox County, Alabama must be disabused of the belief that Mr. Calhoun, the recent black candidate for sheriff who lost in spite of the fact that Negroes outvoted whites by a huge majority, can do as good a job as sheriff as the white man that the Negroes put in office, and maybe better. Many blacks assert that this will not happen if whites continue to help to do the organizing, the research, and all the other things.

LET "WHITEY" DO IT.

It is increasingly contended that the very presence of whites has a very serious intimidating effect on the masses of black people. Because they have been taught it all their lives, many continue to believe that "if you're black, stay back," and that "white is right." Thus many black people have developed the habit of letting the whites take the initiative. So militant blacks want to remove this impediment. "Let whitey do it" is saved for white organizing and fighting in Vietnam.

If you do not readily take to this line of reasoning, as I did not, you are offered other compelling arguments for confining your work to the white community. Let me state three more that I know.

WHAT WHITES CAN DO

1) There is much talk by whites about an interracial movement of the poor. But there is no movement of poor whites with whom the thousands of organized Negroes may ally themselves. (See article on White Organizing in this issue of NSS.) Most blacks in the Movement realize that poor Negroes need allies, and that over and above the questions of black consciousness and unity, there must be class unity. But they question whether poor whites, who do the dirty work of bombing and beating, can be organized. None of us whites are demonstrating to them that they are wrong; but we are agreed that whites must do it. (Many Negroes argue that disaffected middleclass whites have been taking the easy route and escaping to the black community.)

2) There is also the problem of racism in America which pervades all classes of whites. That is must be eliminated is obvious. This means that whites too must be made conscious of Negro history, African contributions to man's culture, and all the other things discussed above. The implications of this task for our educational system at all levels are far reaching. Whites who man school boards, who teach whites, who write books, and

WHITE ORGANIZING: NEW ODYSSEY

White civil rights workers throughout the South are now navigating difficult currents in their journey home. On one side of their frail craft lies the Scylla of Black Consciousness (see article in this newsletter), with the implication that whites cannot continue their present role in the Negro freedom movement; on the other side lies the stark statistical Charybdis of the Alabama Democratic primary, in which at most 3% of all whites voting chose Richmond Flowers, despite the fact that he was the only candidate who offered a platform geared to the interests of the poor.

The only existing Southern organizing project involving whites is the Southern Mountain Project of the Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF). The SMP will attempt to build an interracial movement of the poor, using an integrated staff to organize around permanent unemployment pay, better medical care, effective anti-poverty programs and more responsive elected officials. Their East Tennessee based experimental project has been in operation since last June, chiefly familiarizing the community with them and vice versa. It is still too early to judge its potentiality.

While accepting the basic SMP program most civil rights workers are inclined to believe that, even disregarding the importance of building black consciousness, initial interracial organization is an Achilles Heel which foredooms the project to failure.

Some find the siren song of rural white organizing most enticing, and would like to begin in one of the poorer counties of Appalachia, either in Kentucky or East Tennessee. Others favor initiating a project in a Border State city, such as Louisville, Wheeling or St. Louis, with the idea that knowledge and Deep South migrants found there would make eventual organizing further South more fruitful (a sort of human Trojan Horse technique).

Those with personal experience cite obstacles beyond the racial question which make white organizing more difficult than work in black communities. Poor whites, particularly in rural areas, are extremely suspicious of outsiders. Also, despite their oppression, they tend to identify more strongly than Negroes with the existing community leadership, making it more difficult for them to perceive the broad patterns of exploitation and build a competing organization. In the Negro community the clergy has often been important in beginning movement groups; this would be unlikely in a white community. For these reasons an urban community, where rural in-migrants are themselves strangers, socially dislocated and unrelated to local power elements, seems a more likely starting point.

The actual location of a project will probably be determined by the proclivities of the organizers. At its April Conference, SSOC voted to support a white community project whose organizers seem capable and committed, without specifying location. Even Alabama and Mississippi were not excluded, since SSOC sees, as Odysseus with the Cyclops that in the land of the one-eyed the two-eyed is king. Two young men who have worked with SNCC in Alabama have expressed a desire to begin a project, but neither can commit himself for longer than 3 months and SSOC is attempting to find someone who could begin with them and continue the project for at least a year, with the (If you are interested please write immediately).

In any event, it looks like a long trip and young Southern white activists are presently hesitant to attest that any Penelopes are eagerly waiting to welcome them.

VIETNAM DRAFT EXAM

Although this newsletter is going to press before May 14th and returns are still incomplete, it is already clear that the National Vietnam Exam program will involve significantly more Southern students than any previous peace or civil rights effort in menory! In Louisiana every single testing center for the Seledtive Service College Qualification Test (there are sixteen) will be attended by people passing out the National Vietnam Exam. This countertest on the issues of the War in Vietman was composed by scholars from the Inter-University Committee for Debate on Foreign Policy and Students for a Democratic Society. SSOC is co-ordinating its distribution in twelve Southern States, not only at schools with a history of social action, but at many traditionally dormant colleges.

The power of this organized response to the "draft tests" is made clear by the support we are already getting. On Tuesday Rep. Adam Clayton Powell stated that the draft tests are "reminiscent of Hitler's twin system of eugenics and education--weed out the intellactually deprived or socially undesirables by conscripting them or cannon fodder."

The overwhelming success of this program raises two crucial questions: Can campus people follow up the Vietnam Exam by starting organized social action groups and continuing creative programing? Can SSOC continue to unite Southern students around significant programs which both old and new activists will respond to? The answer to both of these questions clearly depends on you.

SCC MEETS

The Southern Coordinating Committee To End the War in Vietnam held its second conference on April 23-24 in Nashville.

The eighty participants came from twelve states, representing colleges and independent anti-war committees, or themselves. At least fifty-two committees are known to exist in the South. The conferees voted to become the southern region of the National Coordinating Commettee, formalizing a previously functional role.

A large part of the discussion centered around the problem of confronting the traditional conservatism of most Southerners, who now view the Vietnam conflict as a Holy War Against Communism, and thus are not initially open to any alternatives to present U.S. policies. It was suggested that volunteers work full time this summer to involve people throughout the South in an examination of the War.

Much debate involved the small role by Negroes in the anti-war movement in the South. Civil rights workers present felt that although there is substantial opposition to the War in the Negro community, the freedom movement is of much greater concern at present and absorbs all of their enerfies.

Finances, the eternal Governor Wallace of left of center causes, was brought up, and several committees pledged support. The SCC office is attempting to find a full time fundraiser to bring the office budget up to meager.

Dwain Wilder, present SCC secretary, emphasized that staff is a primary need of the SCC, both for the summer volunteer program and for the office in all capacities. The conference failed to come up with a solution to this problem, although several participants said they had possible recruits in mind.

Many people in attendance were concerned by the lack of program discussion, other than the "town meeting summer" and the SDS draft exam (see articles in this newsletter). This hiatus reflected a general feeling that massive programs are unrealistic in the near future since the Southern peace movement is still a miniscule, though growing, minority in a hostile or indifferent land.

who program for the mass media must be confronted with the issue of racism. And whites must forcefully make this confrontation--no small task.

Furthermore, those of us who cherish the idea of an integrated society, whether we be white or Negro, must ask ourselves if it is integration or assimilation that we are about at present. If it is the latter, and I think it is, then perhaps we must wait for real integration. The whole discussion of integration has to do with absorption, not with sharing. This must stop!

3) The Blacks who say that the war in Vietnam is a racist, white man's war assert that whites must end it. A corollary of this is that they will admit of no responsibility for participation in the Peace Movement as such.

SOME SERIOUS QUESTIONS

In the last analysis, I must admit that I have serious questions about much of what I have tried to relate in the above. When I heard about the recent all-black meeting in New Orleans, I was not half joking when I suggested that we whites must hold "sit-ins" at the affair to protest and "obviously unjust situation." The injustice is not so obvious to me now. Furthermore, it must be emphasized that many, many in Snick and in the community do not hold with all or even part of these views. Others accept them as a temporary tactic, some as a long range strategy.

There are several questions, some implicit in this paper, which I am not prepared to deal with at this time, but which must be answered soon:
1) Who is "black"?Those advocating Black Consciousness now accept the white definition. Is Ralph Bunche "black"?
2) H w can blacks be unified so that BC can be developed in such a "white" land?
3) Is there danger of an ideology of Black Superiority developing from this?
4) Where is the "Beloved Community"?

Much rough road will be traveled in the thrashing out of this whole thing in the South. The Northern Student Movement was at this point two years ago. It is now all black with many white friends. Snick and other viable parts of the southern black Movement appear to be heading in the same direction. Wailing and gnashing of teeth is senseless. What is needed is a serious attempt at understanding and openness; and much work in the white community.

ALCORN

FOUR MORE EXPELLED

Four student leaders at Alcorn College, Lorman Mississippi, have been kicked out of school for "conduct unbecoming to a student." Their case has been taken by the Lawyer's Constitutional Defense Committee in Jackson, an affiliate of ACLU. The administration acted on May 4. A demonstration, planned for that evening, was called off. There have been no demonstrations since early April at Alcorn.

TWO BUILDINGS MYSTERIOUSLY DESTROYED

The student union building was wrecked from top to bottom recently. This included two demolished color T.V. sets, a wrecked book store and grill. In addition, a tool shed containing many valuable tools belonging to a construction company was burned to the ground.

Clifton McFarland, Jr., a student from Natchez who was suspended in early March for "interfering with a security officer," has been granted a hearing by the State Board of Trustees. McFarland, also represented by LCDC, will appeal his case to the courts if the Board's decision is unfavorable. Ousted in a Kangaroo Court type proceeding, McFarland was suspected by the administration of being a member of the NAACP.

SUMMER PEACE PROJECTS

The South, except in a few isolated areas, has not participated in the raging debate over the present crisis in foreign policy that has swept the country. Because of this lack SSOC is sponsoring a Summer Foreign Policy Education project to have students working in cities of the South talking to clergymen, labor people, other students, professional people, etc. The purpose of this project will be to organize people to talk and learn about why we are involved in Viet Nam, what the arguments are for staying there, and what the arguments are for leaving. We will need to try a lot of different thing---setting up discussion seminars, door-to-door canvassing, community teach-ins, etc. We hope to have a south-wide newsletter for discussion among summer volunteers as well as an end of the summer evaluation session. Finally, we need contributions for subsistence wages, for the orientation, etc. Contributions are tax-exempt. Make checks payable to SSOC for the Summer Foreign Policy Education Project.

We need volunteers immediately. Please fill out the application form on the opposite page. We need offers of free room and/or board for the summer from concerned adults and local committees in the South.

There will be an orientation session including discussions led by competent people on the war and the issues raised by it, as well as discussions on various kinds of organizing and programming. Experienced people will be present. We hope that volunteers will prepare working papers for the orientation to serve as a basis for discussion groups.

An Alabama student informed us this week that she is going to Peru with the Methodist Board of Missions instead of the Peace Corps so that she will have more political freedom.

DUKE EMPLOYEES' LOCAL

For the past year, employees, students and union representatives have been working to organize a union of campus service employees at Duke University in Durham, North Carolina.

A number of gains have been achieved from the effort so far. The university is raising wages. It has been forced to establish a grievance procedure, and several employees who were fired because of union activity have regained their jobs. There is a new relationship between employees and supervisors which is beginning to strip away much of the Old South paternalism.

However the university refuses to recognize the employees' right to collective bargaining. This is not surprising. North Carolina has the largest percentage of unorganized workers in the nation. Only 7% of the state's work force is organized. The dominant industries, textiles, furniture, and tobacco, have fought unions bitterly. The power behind the university is a reflection of the industrial power of the state.

Students at Duke are planning to expand their part in the union effort over the summer. They will begin community organizing in three Negro areas of Durham where most Duke service employees live. The students will work with the union activists living in these areas to tie community work to the union campaign.

The union needs your support for the summer activities. If they succeed, Duke will become the first organized campus in the South, and they will have forced a major power to change.

Contributions for the Duke campaign can be sent directly to Duke Local 77, AFSCME, 604 West Chapel Hill Street, Durham, North Carolina. (A complete history of the Duke campaign is available from SSOC).

September 14, 1966

Dear Friends:

SSOC has undergone several important changes since you last heard from us. During the past summer two meetings were held at the new SSOC camp in Buckeye Cove, North Carolina and decisions made there reflect the growth and development of the organization.

The June Buckeye Cove meeting was the result of a mandate from the Spring SSOC Conference to hold a summer meeting for the purpose of resolving the questions of membership and programming for the coming year. Last week the executive committee met at Buckeye Cove to finalize plans for the winter-spring program and to incorporate these plans into foundation proposals.

The decisions of these meetings are described more fully in the attached sheets. The general feeling of both meetings seemed to be that SSOC should "tighten up." In order to expedite our servicing of active and committed students, to insure that SSOC reflects the wishes and needs of its constituency, and to begin creating a genuine movement of southern students, SSOC has become a membership organization. The membership fee is $5.00 per year, including a subscription to THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT. Non-members wishing to receive THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT may subscribe for $3.00 per year. Following the October issue of THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT, names of non-paying subscribers will be removed from the mailing list. We feel it is time to face the fact that if SSOC is to continue its work, it must become at least partially self-sustaining.

Programs for the fall include a conference on the university to be held in the Carolinas, a Florida conference on migrant farm labor, speaker tours in the deep and middle South, state-wide campus travelers in Florida, Tennessee, and Virginia, and a greatly expanded literature program. In addition, SSOC will help support three related community projects in Nashville, Southside Virginia, and Atlanta. SSOC staff for the fall presently numbers seven.

Read the enclosed information carefully and send in your membership and NEW SOUTH STUDENT blank in the self-addressed envelope. Let us hear from you on your plans for the fall and specific things we can do to help you, as well as your thoughts on what SSOC should be doing.

For a New South,

Steve Wise

P.S. If you have recently sent in the $3.00 subscription fee, an additional $2.00 will make you a SSOC member. PLEASE INCLUDE YOUR ZIP CODE ON ALL CORRESPONDENCE WITH US.

WHAT'S HAPPENIN'?

Plans for the coming year are open. Part of this openness is a conscious effort to remain flexible enough to meet needs when they arise, and part is forced on the organization by uncertainty about things like money and staff availability.

Conferences

There are two conferences planned for the fall. One is a conference on the university and its reformation planned for the Carolinas around Thanksgiving. It is hoped that SSOC and the Southern Project of NSA will be able to co-sponsor this conference. The second is a conference on migrant farm labor to be held in late October or early November in Florida. This conference will coincide with a drive by organized labor to organize farm workers in that state. Following the conference a SSOC traveller will remain in the state to help relate students to the drive and provide general servicing. Plans are also being made for another Christmas workshop on the South to be held at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington. Some thought is being given to another students and labor conference for the winter to be held in Texas, perhaps.

Travellers

SSOC will have regional travellers in Virginia, Tennessee, and Florida this fall. Other staff members will be doing some general campus travelling, and travelling to campuses in response to specific needs.

Publications

Because of its continued expansion in scope and size, the New South Student will have a full-time editor this year. The format of the paper will be basically the same, but coverage will be expanded. The work-list mailing will continue and will be sent to SSOC members. Finally the office will continue to reprint and publish articles and working papers on various topics.

Community Projects

SSOC will continue to support the Virginia Students Civil Rights Committee's project in southside Virginia and the North Nashville Project. The North Nashville Project has been working in two black areas of the city, and this fall a SSOC staff member will begin work in a poor white area. Another staff member has begun a project in Atlanta working with members of the university and middle-class community.

Speakers

The SSOC office will begin a speaker program this fall. Information on speakers who are willing and/or eager to do speaking around the South will be compiled and sent to campus groups. In addition several speaker tours are planned for the spring.

Membership and Chapter Servicing

As SSOC chapters are formed and membership increases, SSOC will be searching for effective ways to service and coordinate the activities of active students. Planned are an expanded literature distribution program, the speaker program, and available staff to assist chapters with their own programs.

Folk Tour

Another folk tour is planned for this year. The tour will cover more schools and earlier notice will be given so that chapters will be able to make more adequate arrangements. A workshop is planned for this fall to make plans for the tour.

SSOC Camp

SSOC has a five-year lease on a camp in Buckeye Cove, North Carolina. The camp can be used for weekend meetings and seminars in good weather, and is available for general use by SSOC chapters and members. Plans are being made for a summer-long seminar or institute to be held at the camp.

In thinking about SSOC programs for the coming year it might be helpful to review some of the things SSOC was able to do last year:

Held a two-week workshop at Highlander Center in September, 1965. The workshop dealt with programs for the '65-'66 school year.

Co-sponsored with the Southern Project of the National Student Association a conference for Florida students.

Sponsored a regional conference on university reform held Thanksgiving weekend at the University of Arkansas.

Assisted the Virginia Students' Civil Rights Committee in holding a state-wide student conference.

Sponsored at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington a Christmas workshop focusing on economic and political trends in the South.

Planned and held a student conference in Mississippi which examined projected problems in the state.

Sponsored a conference on students and labor held in April in North Carolina.

Gave assistance to two SSOC-related community projects in southside Virginia and Atlanta, and helped initiate a third in Nashville.

Coordinated the SDS draft exam program in the South.

Disseminated information on the student revolt at Alcorn A & M College in Mississippi and sponsored a related southern protest of poor education in the South.

Sponsored a movement folk tour which visited twenty southern campuses and communities.

Published nine issues of the New South Student.

Recruited seven students to work on a summer drive to organize eastern migrant farm workers into a labor union.

Sponsored a South-wide, issue-oriented conference in Atlanta in the spring.

Made campus visits to approximately one hundred southern schools during the school year.

Leased for five years a three hundred acre camp near Asheville, North Carolina to be used for student and movement meetings, seminars, and recreation.

We are anxious to hear your ideas on the projected programs for the coming year as well as any other suggestions you may have. The degree of success of any SSOC program is wholly dependent on your participation and critical evaluation.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END

Many of you have been receiving THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT for nearly two years now. During that time you have seen it grow from a four-page bulletin going out to fifty people to a 25-page newsletter reaching more than 4,000 readers monthly with expanded coverage of campus and community social action across the South, as well as opinion columns, programming suggestions, book reviews, and feature articles.

Concurrent with the growth of THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT has been an increase in the cost of publishing and our largess, in the form of free subscriptions, must now necessarily come to an end. If THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT is to continue to expand and improve, its readership must begin to financially support it.

In October you will receive the first issue of THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT for this school year. Regrettably, unless we hear from you, this will be the last issue you receive. A year's subscription to THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT is $3.00. An additional $2.00 will make you a full-fledged member of SSOC. Let us hear from you by using the enclosed order blank and self-addressed envelope.

THE UNIVERSITY

OF THE STATUS QUO. . .by David Nolan

Education, as Clark Kerr so fondly pointed out, has become a big business. There are many important and powerful people with an interest in education, how it is conducted, and what it results in. As long as education continues in a manner of which they approve, they are willing to endorse it publicly and support it financially. Most major corporations donate large sums each year to colleges and universities, in the form of endowed chairs, scholarships, matching grants, etc. In return, these corporations seek the cream of the graduate crop as employees for their businesses, and they expect that the schools will have conditioned them for the corporate way of life. Writers like William Whyte in The Organization Man have described some of the basic tenets of the corporative way of life. Suffice it to say that the American protest tradition is not looked upon favorably in the business community. Thus, when Staunton Lynd went to Hanoi last December, there were demands that he be removed from the faculty of Yale University, and threats that if he were not removed, future donations would not be forthcoming.

The Corporate Donor

Jacques Barzun, Dean of the Faculties at Columbia University, criticizes the attitude of the corporate donor to education, writing, "He does not really give, he buys. On the surface there is in this nothing very wicked, it is 'very human. Still, it is contrary to the right conditions of intellect. Sometimes the giver wants the childish satisfaction of publicity--a name, a notice, another illustrated booklet. More often, he wants the pleasure of handing out the dole, of fussing around the beneficiaries, of appointing the holder of the chair and even of rebaptizing subject matter." Barzun concludes, from the conduct of this type of donor, "It is diverting at any age to play school."

State Funds

There are other financial supports for education. The state legislatures contribute to Negro and white state schools in the South. And with this state support also come some strings. In Alabama, Governor Wallace has threatened to expel any college student who does not support the war in Vietnam. The North Carolina state legislature, under the leadership of State Senator Clarence Stone of Stoneyville, passed a law banning from state schools any speakers defined as "fascists, communists, or fifth ammendment communists." Senator Stone's younger brother William, who is a member of the Virginia State Senate, was impressed by the North Carolina law and horrified by the appearance of George Lincoln Rockwell as Gus Hall at the University of Virginia. So he tried unsuccessfully to get Virginia to enact a speaker ban law. The move was scuttled when the state's college presidents assured the public that they would not let any undesirables speak on the campus--that the law would be unnecessary and a violation of academic freedom at the same time.

The North Carolina law was repealed when UNC Chapel Hill was threatened with loss of accreditation, and the power to ban speakers was given to the Board of Trustees. The Board subsequently prevented Herbert Aptheker from speaking on campus.

When the League for Responsible Sexual Freedom was formed at the University of Texas, State Senator Grady Hazelwood demanded that state funds be cut off from the institution until the organization, which advocated repeal of the state anti-miscegenation, fornication, and homosexuality laws, was banned.

In 1965, after Steve Weissman of the Free Speech Movement toured the South for SSOC, the Tennessee state board of education ruled that, "subversive speakers were not welcome on state-controlled campuses."

These and more flagrant examples like Governor Wallace standing in the schoolhouse door at the University of Alabama, show that the strings attached to state funds do not make for academic freedom in the South.

The "Liberal" Donor

There are outside financial pressures on southern schools, from some foundations and the federal government that may bring about a change in racial policies so that they take a Northern rather than a southern air. The Ford Foundation (a major contributor to education now run by McGeorge Bundy who previously made our Vietnam policy) will only give to schools that do not practice racial discrimination. So we have the typical scene of schools like Lynchburg College and Washington and Lee University frantically beating the bushes in search of one Negro student, in order to qualify for millions of dollars in potential foundation aid. And we have Dr. Edgar Finley Shannon, Jr., of the University of Virginia, constantly reaffirming his institution's "longstanding policy of nondiscrimination" while the percentage of Negro students at the school has dwindled constantly over the past decade to about one quarter of one percent.

On the other side of the coin there are several foundations in Texas and elsewhere which press financially for a distinctively southern racial attitude. And there are the unreconstructed Bible-belters who continue to support schools like Bob Jones Jr. University in Greenville, South Carolina.

There are also important alumni donations from the wealthy who look back fondly on old Siwash and her football team. Or those like tobacco king James Buchanan Duke who used their tainted fortunes to educate further generations.

Who Runs the Schools?

Students at Berkeley, in their research, discovered that under the laws of California, the University was the property of the regents. Whether or not they exercise it, the regents, or trustees of our schools have great potential power, so it is important that we know who these men are, how they are selected, and what they believe. This is something that must be done for each campus. In general you will find on the board of trustees some prominent alumni, powerful legislators, millionaire businessmen, the president of the school, and at state schools, a representative of the state. They may be appointed by the governor for specific terms, or they may have a self-perpetuating system where the old trustees select the new ones, or there may be other arrangements. In church schools there will usually be representatives of the church both in clergy and lay people. Many boards are proportionally divided among the interests to be represented there. One thing that you will usually not find on the board is a bona fide practicing educator outside of the administrative ranks. And one thing you will never find is a representative of the student body, which is the main beneficiary (or victim, depending on your point of view) of the education that these trustees are purveying. So the basic setup of the boards of trustees is nothing like democratic, but something like oligarchic, or plutocratic, or what have you. The students and the teachers, who form the great body of those concerned, are unrepresented; while distant individuals representing something that is usually political, financial, or religious are given the final voice in matters.

Responsive Administration

Of course, it is absurd to suppose that our trustees, with the weight of their own lives and businesses will concern themselves with such minute matters as dormitory assignments, class changes, and grading of students. But when a basic policy is at stake--like Herbert Aptheker speaking on campus or a thousand students marching on the state capitol--the voice of the trustees will be heard.

The people who know this are the administrators who run the school and are responsible to the trustees. As long as there are no scandals or outbursts sufficient to arouse the interest of the trustees, they are free to run the school as they please. But they have a very firm conception of how far the trustees will let them go, and they are not adverse to creating a margin of safety. It is the students who suffer from the harsh rulings of an administration that wants to play it safe with the trustees.

Are the students the main concern of the administration, or are they just an incidental annoyance? Is the focus really elsewhere, with raising money, pleasing alumni, and backstabbing fellow administrators on the rise? Isn't their concern with students primarily that they "underground education", keep their mouths shut and don't rock the boat? In one of his memorable speeches at Berkeley, Mario Savio complained that, "the University is well structured, well tooled, to turn out people with all the sharp edges worn off, the well rounded person."

Today's Student

The student who goes to college believing the propaganda of the conventional wisdom that he is a future leader in whom America places great trust, should be quickly disabused of that notion by the treatment he receives. He will find that his sexual life is limited by college policies banning women from the dorms, that his consumption of alcohol is limited by policies banning liquor from the campus, that his travel is limited by his being forbidden to have an automobile during his freshman year and sometimes all through college, his religious practices are regulated by compulsory chapel attendance, and his dress habits are limited by coat and tie policies, just to mention a few. If this same person had chosen on his 18th birthday to abjure his position in the educational elite and become a truck driver or auto mechanic, he would have his full rights as a citizen. If the ability to think for oneself and act independently is the lasting value of any education, we must heed Tom Hayden's warning, "An authoritarian institution does not develop independent people. An authoritarian college within a society that basically values money and power, conformity and success, established habits and the status quo, does not develop independent people."

The university makes all these regulations under the guise of the legal doctrine of in loco parentis (in place of the parents.) This "father knows best" attitude is probably worst in church schools and Negro schools, and one wonders if the administrators really care about the students, or if they are just fearful of adverse publicity the students might create. At the root of it must be an undeniably low opinion of mankind, for there would be no need of these all-encompassing regulations unless one firmly believed that the moment he is freed of restrictions, the student would get drunk, high on pot, and mow down innocent pedestrians while fathering illegitimate children in the back seat of a speeding car. Or something of the sort. Involved here is also something of a generational conflict. When our trustees were raised forty or sixty or eighty years ago, attitudes on matters like sex were quite different. So today's student left to his own devices would probably not choose virginity, but that does not necessarily make him the demon some of our oldsters must see.

The Degree Seeker

We ask, then, why do students put up with this? In order to find this out we must ask why most students are in school. I think it would be a mistake to say "for an education." Beneath the platitudes some of them probably sincerely believed, I think that most people are students in order to get draft deferments, and because social pressures dictate that you have a college degree to "make it" in the world. And if it were possible to get these things without going through the four years of pressure-cooker college, I would not be surprised if our student bodies were largely depopulated.

About ten years ago the Census Bureau compiled figures on the potential lifetime earnings of people. A high school graduate could expect $156,000. The person with three years of college could expect $190,000. The college graduate could look forward to $268,000. Thus three years of college are worth only $25,000, while the last year alone nets $78,000. So I think it is undisputed that it is the degree, not what is behind it, that society demands.

I think of some of our academically superior students, like Mario Savio and Stokely Carmichael, and wonder if their college years better prepared them to be junior executives for the Ford Motor Company trying to sell the public on the idea of unsafe autos. Savio wrote sadly, "the University is well-equipped to produce that sort of person, and this means that the best among the people who enter for four years wander aimlessly, much of the time questioning why they are on campus at all, doubting whether there is any point in what they are doing and looking toward a very bleak existence afterward in a game in which all of the rules have been made up, which one cannot really amend."

Lack of Motivation

And so, faced with a net gain of $78,000 (which has undoubtedly gone up with inflation), threatened on the one hand by family pressures and on the other by the draft, the student is willing to put up with in loco parentis, speaker bans, mickey mouse student government, large classes, small libraries, etc., because "this too will pass." It is just a four year interlude from real life, unrelated to anything before or after, except greater financial rewards, so you learn to grin and bear it and get as much illicit beer and sex as you can on the side to make it more enjoyable.

Given these attitudes on the part of many students, it is not hard to see why the administration is able to make them abide by its regulations.

Administration Trump

As long as the goals of students are to avoid the draft, get a degree, and have it "made" in later life, the administration will always have the upper hand over them, because it is the school that is the route to these things. And as long as the administrators see that students will not stand up to their demands when threatened with expulsion, there will remain a "credibility gap" of rather large size when the call is put forward for campus reform. It will always be easier to expel a few students or fire a couple of troublemaking professors than it will be to change the entire school, so our authoritarian administrators will be led down this path of least resistance.

We are facing the university of the status quo which, despite educational platitudes, is firmly committed to retaining things as they are. In doing this it has the support of those other institutions in our society that do not look forward to the "good new days."

It will do for us to be no less serious in our advocacy of change than is the opposition in its support of the status quo. We should not expect that we can have our cake and eat it too--get all the goodies of this society and attack it at the same time. Nor should we imagine that the fight is limited to the small ground of university reform, because our condition here is merely a reflection of the close minded society that in other spheres perpetuates racism and wages a war of genocide upon the people of Vietnam.

Though the compensation may not be attractive, the need is certainly great, when we consider the alternatives--"Peace in the world or the world in pieces."

U. VA. SSOC

OPENING WEEK GOINGS ON

At its first meeting of the school year, the Students for Social Action at the University of Virginia voted to become a SSOC chapter, thus earning the distinction of being the first such group in the South. During the orientation period for entering students, U.Va. SSOC organized several activities through which to acquaint new students with the presence at the university of a radical action group. A table was set up at the registration line outside the gymnasium on registration day. Representatives from SSOC were present at "Activities Night," a function sponsored by the student union to introduce new students to the organizations on campus. A literature table was set up several times in the student union between the two cafeterias, at which SSOC literature was distributed.

The message that U. Va. SSOC was trying to convey to the incoming class is summed up in a letter which was distributed to each room in the first year dormitories. The purpose of the letter was to encourage students to question the right of the university to make student policy without in any way consulting the student body, and to think through for themselves what the nature of a real university ought to be. The following is the text of that letter.

AN OPEN LETTER TO ENTERING STUDENTS

You have probably come to the University of Virginia thinking that you were going to become a part of an adult community of students and scholars. You have been told by the university that you will be treated as gentlemen; that your word will be respected; and that you will be responsible for shaping your own future. The university has been described to you as an academical village, modeled after the plans of its founder, Thomas Jefferson. How true a picture this is of the actual state of affairs here you will find out for yourselves in the ensuing months. We would like only to raise some fundamental questions about the way in which the university is run; you may decide for yourselves whether the issues thus raised are compatible with the picture of the university outlined above and described in detail in such publications as the Jeffersonian.

Why has the university adopted the principle of in loco parentis (in the place of the parents)? Should the relationship of a university to its student body be the same as the relationship of a parent to his children?

Why has the administration expanded from its proper role of administering to the university to its present role of controlling nearly all aspects of university life? Why cannot the business of education be left to the students and faculty, and personal business to the individual?

Why should the university require certain courses, and why should these courses have to be taken during the first two years?

Why is a non-credit physical education course required, in which one learns nothing, and passes or fails merely on the basis of attendance?

Why is R.O.T.C. an accredited course of instruction here? What does military training have to do with the pursuit of knowledge? Is it not rather the antithesis of education, teaching men to obey orders without thinking?

Why should the university decide who may have an automobile here and who may not solely on the basis of a student's grades? If adequate parking is the problem, why not limit parking on the grounds by permit to university officials and staff only and let the students, including first yearmen, have cars and find parking where they can?

Why should the university concern itself with the sexual mores of its students who live in the dormitories by forbidding females on the premises?

Why should students living off-grounds be required to have their places of residence approved by a university inspector?

Why should dormitory residence be compulsory for first yearmen?

Why should all students be required to pay an athletic fee, regardless of whether they attend any varsity games or participate in intramural sports?

Why cannot Newcomb Hall Bookstore compete with the corner merchants in the sale of textbooks and supplies for the benefit of the student body? Why must students purchase from the Anderson Brothers-University Bookstore monopoly run by John W. "Billy" Williams, a local functionary of the Byrd machine?

What kind of student government do we have here that can do no more than make requests and recommendations to the administration? Is it not merely a paper organization used to disguise the real power of the administration?

Do we really have a university here, or just an advanced high school?

There is a group of students at the university concerned with these problems and interested in trying to bring about a new university where academic and personal freedom will not be menaced by an administrative bureaucracy. We are the Virginia chapter of the Southern Student Organizing Committee. We are interested in bringing about changes in the university community and in contemporary American society that will advance the freedom and welfare of all.

You are invited to join with us. We will have representatives present at Activities Night to provide any relevant information you might want to know about our group; and our meetings, which will be announced in the Cavalier Daily, are open to interested parties.

NEW BOOKS

Vietnam and the Congo

Felix Green, noted British-American correspondent on China and the Far East has recently published a new book entitled Vietnam! Vietnam! The book combines over 100 pictures of the world's leading news photographers with Greene's closely documented text to provide a very powerful case against the Vietnam war. Jane McManus, of the National Guardian, wrote "Vietnam! Vietnam! is arresting, moving, and factually devastating." Single copy price $2.95; special offer to groups who order 12 or more copies $1.77 each. Available from the Fulton Publishing Co. Box 191, Palo Alto, California, 94302

Challenge of the Congo, announced for release in January by International Publishers of New York, is a new book by the former President of Ghana, Kwame Nkrumah. Among the subjects considered by the author are Katanga's secession, the failure of the U.N. operation, the murder of Lumumba, foreign military intervention at Stanleyville, and Mobutu's coup d'etat. These events are examined in the light of contemporary diplomatic records and documents which are published here for the first time. This is the eighth book by the author, who is generally regarded by friend and foe alike as the most articulate champion of African unity.

SUMMER INSTITUTE

SSOC PROPOSAL FOR RADICAL EDUCATION

One of the ideas discussed at a recent SSOC staff meeting was a summer institute to be held at our new camp in Buckeye Cove, North Carolina. The purpose of such an institute would be to provide some much needed internal education for the organization as well as reaching out to some new constituencies. We hope to involve some new faculty people from southern universities, church people, young professionals, etc. Initial discussion about such an institute has focused around a series of one or two week seminars covering a range of topics.

The following is the text of a letter from David Nolan of Virginia to Jody Palmour in Atlanta in which he outlines some of his ideas as to how the institute might be run and what might be studied there. We are reproducing the letler here in the hope that it will stimulate further discussion about the possibility of a summer institute for next year. The notes on the curriculum are simply suggestions, so please feel free to send us any thoughts you may have--additions or subtractions you would make to David's outline or a new series of topics or format that you think would be better.

August 16, 1966

Dear Jody,

I have written down a few ideas about the Buckeye Cove summer institute that we talked about the other day. They are, of course, only rough notes, and their main value will be as a starting place, something to begin with.

I thought the theme for the summer could be "the American Myth" --emphasizing the difference between myth and reality in several phases of present day America and trying to cut through some of the former to get to the latter.

The summer could be divided into a number of one-week sessions, each to consider a single aspect of the problem. You could encourage people to write papers from this, and publish them in the New South Student and as SSOC pamphlets. You should also make up a reading list prior to the summer, and send it out to the participants. Relevant pamphlets we have could be sent to them at this time.

I guess you'll get a better idea if I outline some of the topics I have been thinking of:

1. The Myth of American Government--do the people rule? Who makes decisions in this country? How much does it cost to run for office, and can any man do it? The supreme court as a political institution. How laws are made, etc. for both federal and state governments.

Possible resource people: Stanley Newman (legislative assistant to Congressman Ryan), Stan Makielski (Institute of Government at UVa.), Jack Minnis (SNCC).

2. The Myth of the American Economy--how is the economy run? Permanent war economy and economic conversion. The economics of poverty. Cybernation and guaranteed annual income.

Possible resource people: Robert Theobold, Don Michael, Robb Burlage (Institute for Policy Studies).

Recommended readings: "Jobs, Machines and People," "Cybernation the Silent Conquest"--Michael, Free Men and Free Markets--Theobald, "This is War"---Burlage, The Peace Race--Seymour Melman.

3. The Myth of the American Legal System--law vs. justice, the cost of justice, civil liberties and privacy invaders, the American Bar Association, etc.

Possible resource people: Phil Hirschkop, Bill Higgs (SNCC-FDP), Howard Carwile (Richmond City councilman), Harold Marsh (Tucker and Marsh), Charles Morgan, Jr. (ACLU), Alan Barth (Washington Post).

4. The Free Press? Problems of monopoly control of the news media, managed news, the decreasing number of papers, who sets editorial policy, why does Harry Byrd own all the daily and weekly papers and TV and radio stations in northwestern Virginia? etc.

Possible resource people: Nat Hentoff, Jack Newfield.

Recommended reading: The Press, by A. J. Liebling.

5. Poverty in Appalachia and the Black Belt. What is it, what good are government programs, what is needed, etc.

Possible resource people: Harry Caudill, Myles Horton, Robb Burlage, Rev. Phillip Young (Presbyterian Board of Missions), Betty Garman, J.V. Henry, Jac Wasserman (National Sharecroppers Fund).

Recommended reading: Night Comes to the Cumberlands---Caudill, "Failure of Federal Programs in the Black Belt"--J.V. Henry.

6. American Education. University reform and the free university, school integration, problems of Negro colleges, in loco parentis, ideal forms of education, who runs the schools.

Possible resource people: Christopher Jencks, Paul Goodman, Richard Robbins (Negro Colleges), J. Kenneth Morland, (school integration), Tom Hayden.

Recommended reading: Summerhill--A.S. Neill, Compulsory Miseducation--Goodman, Student Social Action--Hayden, "An End to History," Mario Savio, The Failure of Negro Colleges--Richard Robbins.

7. The Labor Movement---Progressive or Regressive? Current position of AFL-CIO, organizing the poor and the unemployed, the Wobblies, Labor's foreign policy, labor as a wing of the Democratic Party.

Possible resource people: Myles Horton (Highlander Center), Sidney Lens, Earl Davis (COPE), Peter Brandon (AFSCME).

8. Myths in American Foreign Policy: How foreign policy is made, ideology in foreign policy, the role of the corporations and the CIA, America in a Revolutionary World, Vietnam and South Africa.

Possible resource people: Marcus Raskin, Sid Lens, Arthur Waskow, Dave Dellinger (Liberation Magazine).

Recommended reading: The Futile Crusade--Lens, How the United States Got Involved in Vietnam--Scheer, Tragedy of American Foreign Policy--W. A. Williams, American Diplomacy 1900-1950---Kennan, Old Myths and New Realities---Fulbright, Wretched of the Earth--Frantz Fanon.

**********

Just looking over this now I see a large number of repetitions and omissions. For instance, I would like to do something on the draft. And on trends in civil rights (with Anne Braden and Stanley Wise or Stokely). But they can all be added, I guess. There should also be a radical in residence, like Steve Weissman, for instance, who has views on all issues that might be presented.

Anyhow, this is a start. I have talked with Steve Wise, Tom Gardner, Bob Dewart, and they are interested in the idea, so maybe something will come of it yet.

Pax,

David Nolan

CHILD POWER

by Ronda Stilley

Working with the children at the North Nashville Project, as I have with children for many years, has at last awakened me to the tremendous and deliberate stupidity and prejudice on the part of us adults. This came to me suddenly one day after overhearing a very serious discussion among a group of boys during our free play session. They were plotting the "child revolution".

As I listened further, I was surprised at the great bitterness that filled these little boys. They discussed seriously the great superiority complex which invariably pervades all child-adult relationships, and the extreme paternalism (and maternalism) with which they are constantly treated, in both a subtle and blatant manner.

I suppose that in my blindness, I had never even thought of the endless ways in which children are discriminated against. They discussed the way they felt when adults always prefaced their remarks (usually orders) to them by such degrading titles as "sweetie, honey, or dear", always couched in a special condescending tone of voice.

Another little boy objected to the common and accepted practice of signs such as "Children Only", "Children Only If Accompanied by Adults", "Children and Dogs Not Allowed", and the sheer paternalism of giving children special rates. The final straw, however, is the use of big and little water fountains.

The depth of that prejudice was shown in the fact that adults often justify themsevles by comparing themselves to children. Whenever an adult has no self-respect, he can always look down on a child, and the most insulting remark that one adult can make to another is to say that he is acting like a child.

One little boy suggested the possibility of bringing this problem to national attention, and having legislation passed against "child discrimination". He was immediately booed down by a group of 5 and 6-year-old cynics (or perhaps realists) who said that of course, everyone knew there was no equal representation for children, and this would undoubtedly end in a philibuster by the adult-ocrats. Even if a bill was passed, how would the government ever enforce it? Have a policeman or national guardsman present at every bedtime battle??

I felt right at home when I perceived a split between those children who believed in the basic goodness of adults, and believed that they would be forced to change their ways by nonviolent revolution. Others felt that the prejudice was too much a way of adult life, and that the only hope was through violent revolution. The kids got some glee out of discussing the possible fates of mothers, teachers, pediatricians, and especially Sunday School teachers.

Then a very militant 8-year-old, who I later found out is a leader in a group called "Child Nationalists" took the floor. He asked why children should be expected to assimilate into a society as rotten as our adult one. He was drowned by cheers. Then he expressed the doubt that children would ever shed their great sense of inferiority as long as they were in the presence of adults, and that what was necessary was children to lead children out of bondage. This, he declared, was the only way to create "positive child self images". Then the whole group began chanting...."Child Power.....Child Power".

Well, you can imagine how I felt. I began to introspect. I wondered if I was working with children because of a deep-seated sense of guilt about the situation. On the other hand, I wondered if my true motive was really glory and praise at my courage. In many ways, I had to agree with them, but then, what is more ridiculous than an adult "child nationalist"?? Then, I began to wonder if I shouldn't get out of the child movement altogether, and begin to work with adults, to change their abominable attitudes. I simply don't know at this point. I am really confused about my role in the movement, and doubtful about working with my own kind.....I simply don't know.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR

I shall die, but that is all I shall do for Death.

I see him leading his horse out of the stall; I hear the clatter on the barn-floor.
He is in haste; he has business in the Balkans, business in Finland, many calls to make this morning.
But I will not hold the birdle while he cinches the girth.
And he may mount by himself; I will not give him a leg up.

Though he may flick my shoulders with his whip, I will not tell him which way the fox ran.
With his hoof on my breast, I will not tell him where the black boy lies hidden in the swamp.
I shall die but that is all that I shall do for Death.
I am not on his payroll.

I will not tell him the whereabouts of my friends nor of my enemies either.
Though he promise me much, I will not map him the route to any man's door.
Am I a spy in the land of the living, that I should deliver men to Death?
Brother, the password and the plans of our city are safe with me; never through me
Shall you be overcome.

ZIP! ZIP!

Help celebrate National Zip Code Week! The U.S. Post Office has declared Oct. 10-15 National Zip Code Week all across the land, and here in Nashville, too. Following our accepted pattern of collaboration with the federal government, SSOC has decided to endorse the effort and ask all members to cooperate to the fullest.

Seriously, folks, the post office is threatening to clamp down on all bulk mailers (that's us) in the near future if zip code is not used on all material sent through the mails. So please be kind enough to send us your zip code number if you haven't already done so. We anarchists in the office aren't any happier about this than you are (in fact much less).

BUENFIL CASE

CHARLOTTESVILLE NONCOOPERATOR

On the evening of September 14 F.B.I. agents entered the University of Virginia Hospital and arrested John Buenfil, an employee of the radiology department, on a charge of failure to report for induction into the armed forces. Arrest was made only 15 hours after the appointed time of his induction, (5:30 A.M.), an unusual circumstance caused by the fact that John had made a public statement to the effect that he would fail to report which was published in the Charlottesville Daily Progress the day before. He was subsequently released on $1000 bond, and his case will be considered by a grand jury on December 12.

John returned to his home in Charlottesville last spring after a stint at Duke University and the CNVA office in New York. Since that time, he has been active in SSOC activities at U.Va., and has organized the Charlottesville Workshop In Nonviolence. John prepared two statements for the press concerning his stand against compliance with the draft which were published only in expurgated fashion by the Charlottesville paper. We are reproducing both of them here as the best means of explaining John's position. The first is the story of his development of a pacifist philosophy coupled with the history of his dealings with the Charlottesville draft board; the second is a statement explaining the religious convictions making it impossible for him to comply with an armed forces induction order.

I.

I was born in Brooklyn, New York on October 17, 1946 and baptized as an Episcopalian at St. John's Church in that city. I attended church regularly there with my mother and sister until 1957 when we moved to Charlottesville, Virginia. In 1958 my mother and sister joined the Society of Friends and for a period of three to four months I attended Quaker meetings instead of the Episcopal church. Thus receiving through the persons of Mr. Charles Moran, and Mr. Herbert Jehle, my first introduction to pacifism. Although my understanding of Christianity already forced me to oppose killing, I was still convinced that the best way to prevent war was a "balance of power" or threat of violence. Predominantly on this basis, I returned to the Episcopal church and in 1959, was confirmed at Christ Episcopal Church in Charlottesville.

From then until 1964, my beliefs underwent no significant changes. In 1963 I applied for a regular Naval ROTC scholarship, which I didn't get. 1963 was also fortunately the year that I met Tom Rodd on the Quebec, Washington, Guantanamo march, and the first time I began to consider that military service might indeed be contradictory with a sincere belief in Christianity. Then in 1964 I heard for the first time of Vietnam, and realized that the armed forces were not only a deterrent. Thus in October of 1964, I registered as an Episcopal conscientious objector (alternative service) filling in Form 150 at that time.

In August of 1965 I withdrew from Duke University and was immediately classified I-A. On September 27th I had an interview with my local board on my appeal; on the 28th I was again classified I-A, and on the 29th I again appealed. From then until March of 1966 there was no further action on my appeal except for the investigation going on, and the physical which I passed on November 12th. During this period, September to March, I again returned to the Episcopal church, having left, more for political than religious reasons, in November of 1964. On March 4, 1966, I was asked to appear in Roanoke, Virginia, for a hearing with an officer of the Justice Department, but instead sent a letter to him explaining why I could no longer cooperate with the Selective Service System in any form. And sent a copy of that letter along with my registration certificate to my local board. My certificate was returned on April 11 and I returned it to my board with a further explanation of my position on April 17th, stating that I was also ending my correspondence with the Selective Service System at that time. On August 23, I was classified I-A by a 3-0 vote of the appeal board (apparently still working on my CO appeal) and on August 24th, I received orders to report for induction on September 14th.

I do not intend to report for induction, not to notify my draft board further than I have already done. I will, however, attempt to get a letter explaining my position into the local paper, and certainly won't do anything to avoid arrest. As for an actual trial I cannot plead not guilty to an act which I did commit, nor guilty to a crime which I do not recognize as such, although I suspect that to plead in precisely this manner would result in the court entering a not-guilty plea for me.

II

To say that I am an Episcopal pacifist is to be repetitious. To be an Episcopalian, indeed to be a Christian, means not only that I know we should love our neighbors as ourselves, (Matthew 22:37-40) but also that I try to live by these laws. In order to call myself a Christian, I am required to love my enemies, to do good to them which hate me, and to bless them that curse me. (Luke 6:27-36) Thus in order to be an Episcopalean, I must be a pacifist.

However, not all persons who claim to be Christians share this belief. Some say, "You are just taking parts of the Bible out of context." To them I can only answer, look in the Bible. Is there any context in which you can interpret the phrase "Resist not evil," (Matthew 5:39) as meaning you should serve in the army? While by considering such a statement as the following in light of the Bible as a whole, it is apparent that "I came not to send peace, but a sword," (Matthew 10:34) means that Christ came not to end strife, but to renew the battle between good and evil; but the weapon which he alone could give was not a piece of sharpened steel, but all-conquering Christian Love.

And some say, "This is idealism, it cannot be practiced in the present world situation." And again I answer, look in the Bible. Christ did not live in the garden of Eden. Yet even when the chief priests and elders came with swords and staves to take Him to be crucified, and Peter struck one of them with his sword, Christ rebuked him, saying, "Put up again thy sword in his place; for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." (Matthew 26:47-52)

And finally, there are some who say, "You are right, you should not kill, but why didn't you continue trying to become recognized by the Government as a Conscientious Objector, instead of refusing to cooperate with the Selective Service System?" And a third time, my reply is, look in the Bible. The Bible does not say only that I should not kill, but that no men should kill. I cannot practice nor even preach Christianity, as long as I continue to support, through any form of cooperation, that portion of the United States Government whose sole purpose is to recruit and train men to violate God's laws, and not love, and kill.

In any case, where the laws of God and the laws of men conflict, the Christian must unswervingly follow the Christ. The legislators of this nation apparently recognized this truth when they declared ours to be,"...one nation under God..." The Nuremburg decision against Hermann Goering, of which the United States was a major proponent, states in part that when a country is committing crimes against humanity, it becomes not only the right, but the duty and obligation of every citizen of that country to do everything in his power to stop those crimes. War is a crime against God, and as such must also be a crime against humanity. For all these reasons, I must oppose war and preparation for war, not only with my voice and vote, but with my whole body as well. And thus I must refuse to report for my induction.

U.S. VS. DUVERNAY

by Jack Frazier

"You don't go to court for justice, you go to court for law." The person who said that must have had in mind the type of situation that prevailed in Justice Christenberry's court in New Orleans on August 30 in the case of the U.S. vs. DuVernay.

On that date an ambitious Assistant U.S. Attorney, a "liberal" federal judge and a middle class jury joined forces to send one Raymond Joseph DuVernay, age 20, to the federal penitentiary for "refusing to report for induction." In reality, DuVernay was guilty of questioning the system which forces black men to fight white men's wars. He was guilty of questioning the value system that refuses to allow Negroes to sit on the all-white draft boards that send their sons to die in Vietnam. While on the witness stand, Mr. DuVernay said, "There's a battle to be fought here in America)." He was also guilty of wanting to support his mother and six brothers and sisters by working for the Poverty Program. In the final analysis, he was found guilty of wanting to preserve life rather than to destroy it.

Everyone who sat in that federal courtroom on August 29 must have had their eyes opened by the revelations brought out by defense attorney Benjamin E. Smith concerning the arbitrary and capricious acts of the draft board. The board's most flagrant violation of due process and human decency was committed on the day Mr. DuVernay's hardship deferment was considered; they met for a total of three hours to discuss, consider, and vote on (individually they claim) 584 cases. That figures out to less than one minute per man--18.5 seconds to be exact; not much time to deliberate the course of a man's future.

Such is the contempt and indifference with which the local white draft board processes the young men whom they are sending to a likely death in Vietnam. If anyone had been wondering what Mr. McNamara meant when he said that the U.S. has another 50,000 draftees "in the pipeline" for next month, he knows now.

The government has not heard the last of Mr. DuVernay. He has filed suit in federal court, charging that the Selective Service Act is being unconstitutionally applied to Negroes in the New Orleans area.

DuVernay has asked that a special three-judge federal court be convened to hear the suit and that it declare the Universal Military Training and Service Act unconstitutional as it is applied to himself and his race.

He also asks that the defendants in the suit be restrained from ordering him to report for induction until such time as qualified Negroes are permitted to sit on the local draft board, and further asks that the present board be restrained from inducting potential Negro draftees out of order. The suit reveals that while Negroes comprise 38% of the total population of New Orleans, none has ever served on the draft board.

The suit charges that the excessively large number of Negroes being called into service and the extremely high percentage of Negro deaths in Vietnam are the result of the pattern and practice of racial discrimination in the operation of the Selective Service System here.

The number of Negroes from New Orleans killed in Vietnam far exceeds the number of white soldiers killed there. The figure has been placed in excess of 60%, and other sources estimate that it might run as high as 75%

SOME THOUGHTS

ON THE DRAFT, by Bob Dewart

The draft presents a series of seemingly endless dilemmas to the young man who is sensitive to the sufferings of others and desires to put his life to some constructive purpose. First, he comes to the realization, from an examination of the present U. S. foreign policy of quashing revolutionary movements in support of the economic status quo, and the dehumanizing process of military training designed to transform human beings into killing machines, that under no condition can he ever accept induction into the armed forces.

At this point, he comes to examine the alternatives to military service which are basically these: (1) Escape from the jurisdiction of the draft by leaving the country; (2) Acceptance of a conscientious objector status within the Selective Service System; (3) Total noncooperation with the system. None of these positions seems entirely satisfactory to me; there are moral dilemmas involved in the adoption of each of them.

Canadian Refuge

Candad is fast becoming a major haven for expatriated Americans. Access to the country is open without passport restrictions; landed immigrant status leading to citizenship is relatively easy to obtain; and best of all, there is no draft in Canada and extradition on a charge of failure to report for induction in the U.S. is not possible if the person entered Canada before the prescribed date of induction.

The major objection to this course of action, as I see it, is that by fleeing the country, a person pretty much relinquishes his opportunity to criticize American foreign policy in any effective manner. If one's rejection of the draft is based on a humanitarian ideology which stands diametrically opposed to the policies of the U.S. in Vietnam and elsewhere, is there not a responsibility incumbent upon such a person to remain in the country, work for peace, and confront the draft? It seems to me that there is, but this is not to deny the possibility that constructive, creative and meaningful work toward social change could be accomplished in Canada.

I-A-O

There are two classifications of conscientious objectors recognized by Selective Service. The I-A-O category involves noncombatant military service (usually in the medical corps) in which a man actually becomes a part of the military--the only concession granted him is that he will not be asked to kill anyone himself. Most men consider such status to be unacceptable, as do I, since one is directly involved in the maintenance and support of the war machine.

I-O

If one receives I-O status, he is required only to do civilian work with an approved agency, which in accordance with Selective Service regulations is not supposed to have any connection with the war effort. At face value, this sounds fully acceptable and compatible with one's anti-war principles. There are, however, debilitating factors lurking just below the surface.

First, there is the elitist nature of the status. The I-O classification is obviously not open to everyone who is opposed to military service, as anyone who has seen the very complicated Selective Service Form 150 knows. A person has to present a well thought-out, sophisticated philosophy of pacifism grounded in religious training and belief (for all practical purposes, this is the case) in order to obtain the classification. Thus people with college training are the only ones likely to succeed in their applications; those not able to play the academic game, regardless of the sincerity of their beliefs, have little chance of success. The college graduate, therefore, in accpeting a I-O classification, is taking advantage of the privileged position that he has enjoyed in our society.

Second, we have the matter of the restrictions placed on the C.O. during his two-year period of alternative service. These are numerous, but let one example suffice. Selective Service demands of the civilian employer that he report any work time lost by the C.O. due to arrest or confinement, and upon receipt of such information, the board has the power to nullify all service performed to date and even reconsider a man's classification.

Third, it should be evident that C.O. classification has been written into law, not out of any consideration for those who oppose war, but as a safety valve for the whole system, as a way of co-opting potential opponents and bringing them quietly into the fold.

Last but not least, a I-O is saddled with the problem of putting up with the SS even after completion of his service. He is still required to carry a draft card and to report any change of address. There is also no guarantee that Congress will not pass new legislation requiring additional service from C.O.'s and for that matter, there is no guarantee that only two years will be required of him under the present statutes--his service can be extended indefinitely by the local board.

Perhaps one further consideration should be brought to light and that is the nuisance value of the 150 form. Arlo Tatum of the Central Committee for Conscientious Objectors in Philadelphia estimates that the processing of a C.O. application through the various levels of appeal and the necessary investigation done by the Justice Department may cost the government as much as $10,000 each. Theoretically, then, great weight could be exerted on the system financially if enough applications were filed. I feel quite certain, however, that the government would simply discontinue C.O. status long before this could ever happen.

Non-Cooperation

At last we arrive at the point of no return---non-cooperation. But even though I see this position as the most ideologically pure of the possible choices, it is not without its drawbacks.

The major advantage of non-cooperation, if reached through mature reflection and real conviction, is that it frees the individual from the fetters with which the system had formerly shackled him. When he reaches the stage where he no longer fears the system, there is really very little the system can do to him. True, they can imprison his body, but they can no longer coerce, intimidate, and frustrate him. He is indeed more free in my opinion than many a college student fearfully poring over a Selective Service student qualifying exam, or a C.O. doing alternative service as a hospital orderly who is afraid to say boo about the war, or a person applying to his board for exemption, who is always watching the mails intently, knowing that he must answer all correspondence from his board within ten days, or risk forfeiting his chance to get his C.O.

The Moral Imperative

The other side of the coin consists of the argument in favor of staying out of prison because of the moral imperative to work for an end to the war. A person concerned about the sufferings of others must feel a pressing need to work for an end to the American war of agression in Vietnam. This can be a very persuasive point, although it is somewhat muted by the general failure of the peace movement to generate any large scale opposition to the war so far.

Resolving the Dilemma

In the final analysis, I think the question boils down to this: does staying out of jail to participate in peace activities compensate for the compromise of conscience required to do this?

I tend to believe not. As long as a person is cooperating with Selective Service, he is not free within himself. A non-cooperator may be behind bars, but he is at peace with himself and his conscience. There is no reason for his two years (or whatever) in prison to be uneventful. He will have ample opportunity to confront people with his beliefs and to put them to practice--life goes on in Chillicothe. And when he gets out he will not be in the compromised, weak-kneed position of the cooperator--he will really be free to carry on the struggle for a world without war.

WHAT'S HAPPNIN'?

Plans for the coming year are open. Part of this openness is a conscious effort to remain flexible enough to meet needs when they arise, and part is forced on the organization by uncertainty about things like money and staff availability.

Conferences

There are two conferences planned for the fall. One is a conference on the university and its reformation planned for the Carolinas around Thanksgiving. It is hoped that SSOC and the Southern Project of NSA will be able to co-sponsor this conference. The second is a conference on migrant farm labor to be held in late October or early November in Florida. This conference will coincide with a drive by organized labor to organize farm workers in that state. Following the conference a SSOC traveller will remain in the state to help relate students to the drive and provide general servicing. Plans are also being made for another Christmas workshop on the South to be held at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington. Some thought is being given to another students and labor conference for the winter to be held in Texas, perhaps.

Travellers

SSOC will have regional travellers in Virginia, Tennessee, and Florida this fall. Other staff members will be doing some general campus travelling, and travelling to campuses in response to specific needs.

Publications

Because of its continued expansion in scope and size, the New South Student will have a full-time editor this year. The format of the paper will be basically the same, but coverage will be expanded. The work-list mailing will continue and will be sent to SSOC members. Finally the office will continue to reprint and publish articles and working papers on various topics.

Community Projects

SSOC will continue to support the Virginia Students Civil Rights Committee's project in southside Virginia and the North Nashville Project. The latter has been working in two black areas of the city, and is also engaged in power structure research. Another staff member has begun a project in Atlanta working with members of the university and middle-class community.

Speakers

The SSOC office will begin a speaker program this fall. Information on speakers who are willing and/or eager to do speaking around the South will be compiled and sent to campus groups. In addition several speaker tours are planned for the spring.

Membership and Chapter Servicing

As SSOC chapters are formed and membership increases, SSOC will be searching for effective ways to service and coordinate the activities of active students. Planned are an expanded literature distribution program, the speaker program, and available staff to assist chapters with their own programs.

Folk Tour

Another folk tour is planned for this year. The tour will cover more schools and earlier notice will be given so that chapters will be able to make more adequate arrangements. A workshop is planned for this fall to make plans for the tour.

SSOC Camp

SSOC has a five-year lease on a camp in Buckeye Cove, North Carolina. The camp can be used for weekend meetings and seminars in good weather, and is available for general use by SSOC chapters and members. Plans are being made for a summer-long seminar or institute to be held at the camp.

We are anxious to hear your ideas on the projected programs for the coming year as well as any other suggestions you may have. The degree of success of any program is wholly dependent on your participation and critical evaluation.

SOUTHERN PROJECT

REACTIVATED BY NSA

by Bill Roberts, Director

The Southern Student Human Relations Project was founded in 1960 by the United States National Student Association, for the purpose of fostering better racial relations in southern states. In 1966 there is an even greater need for this kind of work, but the Project has begun to take the southern educational problems as a focal point for work. The Project has defined human relations to include anything which affects the life of a southern student. Whether the problem is discrimination on campus, academic freedom, course and curricula evaluation, or student government, the Project will make an effort to assist students to work toward a solution.

Although the Project maintains this flexibility, it also has specific programs. During the year it will sponsor or co-sponsor conferences designed to involve and inform students. It also publishes two series of booklets, which should be of interest to students. One of these is the Student Involvement Series. The SIS is a how-to-do-it series, dealing with forming and sustaining student human relations and similar groups, effective student government, etc. The other is the General Information Series, designed to investigate and evaluate specific issues. The first GIS will deal with BLACK POWER. Both of these series are available either free or at a nominal cost.

In short the Southern Project aims to be a service to the southern student. For further information or assistance write:

"Troublemakers", a new film about community organization in a Newark, New Jersey ghetto, is now available from the Newark Community Union Project. The film is recommended for use by community organizing groups, civil rights groups, anti-poverty groups, church groups, and organizer's training sessions. From the program notes of the fourth annual Film Festival comes this high praise: "'Troublemakers' is perhaps the best film of the New American Left, a hard hitting example of a new kind of political film, avoiding both liberal cliches and propaganda." # ORGANIZING MIGRANTS

by Gene Guerrero

Last April SSOC sponsored a "Students and Labor" Conference in North Carolina. The conference brought together students and forward-looking labor representatives to discuss the history and present state of the labor movement, how the labor movement will be working for change in the South, and roles students can play in labor organizing situations.

The general concensus of those attending the conference was that there should be some program which would enable students to work with labor organizers over the summer.

From this came a program in which SSOC recruited seven students to work in the preliminary stages of a drive, conducted by the Industrial Union Department (IUD) of the AFL-CIO, to organize migrant farm workers in Florida.

The Plight of Migrant Workers

Migrants are caught in a combination of very low pay, underemployment, and unemployment. In 1963 a migrant's average earnings were $868. In 1961 total yearly earnings for migrant families where there were three or more workers averaged $1,432.

Migrants are excluded from most of the nation's social legislation, and there are no federal guarantees of their right to collective bargaining.

Working Conditions

Florida's 100,000 or so migrants stay on the move constantly, working from one harvest to the next. From late spring until winter they are scattered throughout the eastern and northern states. During the winter months many move about within Florida.

Most work as part of a crew headed by a crew leader or contractor. Such crews range from 15 to 200 persons. The crew leader contracts with the farmer to provide pickers; recruits and transports them to the field; and sometimes supervises field work.

Normally the farmer pays a piece-rate to the crew leader, who then pays the pickers, taking a cut to cover his expenses and provide his profit. Some crew leaders exploit the workers more than the farmers do. Others treat their crews pretty fairly because they want dependable crews. Finally, there are crew leaders who take more than a self-interest in their crews and are willing to work for real change on the farms.

Beginnings of Unionization

The current Florida union drive began last spring with the formation of an independent association of crew leaders to work for higher piece-rates during the summer season. The association turned to the labor movement for help, and the IUD began work around the middle of June.

The students, four union representatives, and four farm workers worked throughout the summer traveling to migrant camps along the east coast and around the Great Lakes. They talked to wrokers about the union and got names and addresses of those interested to serve as a basis for meetings to be held in Florida this winter.

Almost all workers were found to be dissatisfied, angry, and very interested in building a union. In several places there was either talk of strikes or small independent strikes themselves.

Problems Confronting a Migrant Union

Building a union in Florida will not be easy because of the mobility of the workers. Apparently about the longest stable picking in one spot in Florida is about three months.

The first concentrated effort will be in South Dade County just below Miami. Here the crop is tomatoes and picking lasts from November to about January.

The mobility means that organizing will have to be done on a "crisis" basis with little time for slow building of an organization.

Contest With Delano

This is in contrast to the Grape Strike led by Caesar Chavez in Delano, California where most workers lived year round. This meant more time for organizing and it also meant a different situation with the contractors.

In Delano it was possible to by-pass the contractors by working only with the pickers. In Florida most agree that the contractors should be included.

Current Activity

Right now, work is going on in the Tampa area and in South Florida. No one really knows how it will go. It is expected that resistance from the farmers will be strong and that there will be strikes.

SSOC will continue to work with the drive, helping students relate to the organizing. There are many ways Florida students can help presently, and later on, larger numbers may be called on to help in such things as boycotts. Students who are interested in helping should write to the SSOC office.

NEXT MONTH

The major reason that SSOC decided to have a regular editor for the New South Student this year was to provide the newsletter with increased regularity of publication and coherence of content.

Deadline

The one thing (which has never been rigidly observed in the past) which is an absolute necessity for getting the newsletter on an operative schedule is a hard and fast deadline.

Starting with the November issue, an absolute deadline on articles submitted for publication will be observed. That deadline for the next issue will be November 10.

Thematic Issues

One benefit of increased planning will be (hopefully) that we will be able to publish future issues--say by December--that have a central theme to the contents. Not that we intend such issues to be exclusive of other important happenings, but we feel that three or four articles of related subject matter would serve to provoke serious thought of the topic.

Possible themes to be used in future issues are: East Asia; university reform; Latin America; white community organizing; violence vs. nonviolence; economics, poverty, and labor; the draft; Utopias; the peace movement; new trends in the civil rights movement; and Africa.

People interested in writing on particular aspects of these subjects or in suggesting others should write to the SSOC house.

You Get What You Pay For

The November issue of the New South Student will be going out to members and subscribers only. With such great things planned for the future, you will want to be with us, we're sure.

WE PROMISE...

We promise to be more efficient than in the past in filling orders for literature. We now have an office-manager, Nan Grogan, who opens the mail every day just as soon as it comes in. She assures us that all correspondence will receive prompt attention, especially that for literature with check enclosed.

We further promise to provide for your perusal in the near future an annotated literature list, so that you will have some idea of what we have available. Merry Kassoy is presently busily engaged in the task and should have at least part of our great storehouse of goodies catalogued and ready to go next month.

THE G.T.U.

OR SSOC'S ANSWER TO THE GREAT LEAP FORWARD

by Uncle Ed Hamlett

People ask us just what is the significance of the GREAT TIGHTENIN' UP, or the GTU, as we call it. "Does it have to do with the fact that SSOC is broke, or with the present tight money situation in the country?" they ask. Well, that's partly it. "Is this a response to Black Power? Are y'all purging Yankees?" No, that's not it exactly. "Then does it have to do with a strengthened commitment or an attempt to define yourselves and your goals?" Yes, that's not far off. But unfortunately, the GTU, though perhaps of lesser significance, is similar to democracy, integration, and Black Power, in that it means different things to different people.

Though we realize that no matter how clear we make it, the Establishment and its mass media will give their own interpretations to the public with the inevitable distortions--"SSOC Clutches" or "SSOC Purges Blacks" (or Yankees or Advocates of Nonviolence) or "Castro Cuts Off Contributions to SSOC." But now that we've revealed ourselves, perhaps we should try to make the GTU as clear as we can at the outset.

New Memberships

Some of you got a mailing from SSOC which told of recent developments in the organization. This represents the climax of a debate that has gone on for quite some time. Many of us said that "southern students are too leery of joining a progressive group; they're concerned about membership lists falling into the wrong hands; they're afraid of pressures from parents, classmates, administrators, and racist newspapers." We believe that these fears have eased or loosened.

In addition, SSOC was nearly everything to everybody--White SNCC, Southern SDS, those moderate white kids and bourgeois blacks, the New South Red Guard (would you believe?!), and lord knows what else. While it's good to keep the opposition guessing, things can get sticky when you don't know what you are yourself. Thus, our feeling is that a clearly defined constituency will be able to set policy democratically; the staff will know what the constituency expects from it; and people who make the commitment of joining with us will feel responsible for helping to guide the work. We think that these 'freer' people are ready to 'tighten up.'

Southern Chauvinism

Secondly, and implicit in this development, is the feeling that staff has that southerners--students in this case-have got to begin to support the work of SSOC, if it is important to them that this work continue. Northerners are beginning to turn more and more to the work that so desperately needs to be done up there. We long for the day when y'all will say, "Please, we'd rather do it ourselves," and we hope that this day comes before our northern supporters, to whom we are greatly indebted, tighten up completely. Our dues are $5.00 per year--which is about one week's beer and cigarettes, or the tithe of $50, or the price of a pint of blood. So take your pick--Fast, Tithe, or Bleed for Freedom.

The Newsletter

With regard to the New South Student, many of you were put on the mailing list 'cause you smiled at us pleasantly or said hello at a meeting. You stayed on even when you didn't send us your zip code or the next year's forwarding address. For all we know, you might be dead, working for the Chase Manhattan Bank, or under the thumb of the Department of Defense; or something else equally bad might have happened to you. So for you, if you don't want to join, but want to continue to receive the New South Student, a truly unique publication, the GTU means that you must send us $3.00, which is the price, you guessed it, of 3/5's of a pint of blood.

Staff Ramifications

And the GTU has meaning for the staff also. It means that we have a full-time editor for the New South Student, who hollers at us when we don't meet deadlines for articles, and who plans issues in advance, so that those of you who wish to write on a particular topic can know more than a week in advance when your article is due. It also insures that discussion of important topics can be solicited, and responses requested. The guy who hollers and plans is BOB DEWART, a recent graduate of U. Va. Furthermore, it means that NAN GROGAN has come to us from the Virginia Students; Civil Rights Committee to keep the letters flowing out to y'all, and to holler at us when we don't tighten up on financial matters (she's practically a CPA). Additionally, there's JODY PALMOUR who is working with middle class white adults and with students in Atlanta; and ole GENE GUERRERO is continuing to develop programs whereby students and labor people can cooperate. RONDA STILLEY is researching in Nashville and continuing to work with both SSOC and the North Nashville Project. DAVE NOLAN is traveling in Virginia; and MERRY KASSOY is co-oping with us from Antioch College this fall. Merry will be helping to shape up the literature program, doing some art work for the NSS, and trying to bear with us crazy southerners. JANET DEWART will be joining us in a few days to pick about four of the remaining sixteen jobs that need to be done. Finally almost ancient UNCLE ED HAMLETT will be visiting some of you from time to time, while he tries to understand all this Great Tightenin' Up stuff, which the younger generation has fostered. Won't y'all Tighten Up with us?

A FINAL PLEA FOR UNITY

If anyone has any doubts in his mind as to whether he should join SSOC at this stage, we offer you our statement of faith in the possibility of a new South which is to be found on the back of our spanking new membership card.

"SSOC believes that the South has special problems which create difficulties--and opportunities--for a southern movement working toward the creation of a new and truly democratic South. SSOC believes that each individual Southerner must be guaranteed the right to participate in the formulation of the social, economic, and political decisions which directly affect his life. SSOC further believes that the South possesses valuable traditions, in both black and white cultures, which will enable Southerners to make a unique contribution to a free and democratic America."

If these inspiring words are not motivation enough for you to write to us, perhaps the following message will be. Beginning in the very near future (like next month) our mailing list for the New South Student will be cut to members and subscribers. How about them apples?

1. To give the participants a written statement of what happened
2. To give those who were not able to participate some of the benefits of the discussions.

Presented Compliments of Southern Student Human Relations Project

Report of "INSURGENT NEWSPAPER EDITOR'S CONFERENCE"
December 2, 3, & 4, 1966

The participants drifted in slowly Friday Night and a general discussion about the insurgent press developed.

The Saturday morning session began with a statement by Mr. George Ware, Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, on the purpose of the conference:

1. To encourage the insurgent press on campuses where it is needed and does not exist;

2. To provide an opportunity for an exchange of ideas among students who publish insurgent papers;

3. To discuss the problems of operating on a shoestring budget.

Mr. Ware raised some significant questions about the audiences to which the insurgent press ought to try to speak, suggesting that a paper put out by campus activist for campus activist might not be worth the effort. Do student activist want merely to vindicate their own morality by protesting or do they want to bring change? If radicals want to bring significant change, then the radical press might see its task as one of organizing the non-activist, in this case, it would be necessary to realize that the audience is not necessarily well informed and is not familiar with the general tenets and principles of radicalism. On the other hand, we often underestimate the potential of the campus in general. He also noted that we have "all kinds of patience" with the poor and the illiterate, but we give up on our peers if they do not immediately understand. We ought to be willing to be responsive to the needs of student groups of which we may not entirely approve, ie. football teams, fraternities, etc., in order to do some practical politicing.

After a short discussion of Mr. Ware's ideas, the group adjourned to the SNCC office where Mr. Wilson Brown demonstrated a number of printing machines as well as many technical processes. We were informed that, given enough notice, SNCC might be able to do printing jobs which were too complicated to be accomplished by local groups.

The Saturday afternoon session began with a brief discussion of technical processes somewhat more within the reach of the resourses of most campuses. Headlining and creative use of blank space were suggested as attention drawers. Mr. Bob Dewart(SSOC) explained how to adjust margins for a mimeograph process. Generally, those with some experience felt that people generally underestimate what can be done with mimeographing.

A debate over the merits of selling the papers versus those of giving them away remained unresolved. It was noted that although more people would probably take the paper if it were given away, it does not follow that more people would read it, and that the paper would seem a little less like a propaganda sheet if it bore a price. Further discussion yielded no suggestions of financial aid, although the Southern Project noted that it might be able to contribute small amounts of paper to a desperate situation and SSOC noted that they might be able to grant small amounts of "seed money."

Discussion continued with an inquiry into possible means of making the paper palatable to the campus as a whole(or at least some segment of it other than the dedicated revolutionaries.) Gossip was somewhat facetiously suggested as a possible bait. Other possiblities mentioned included articles from faculty members, art criticism, letters to the editor(especially those which constitute a debate two persons holding opposing viewpoints) and teacher evaluations. Some emphasis on campus issues was urged, and the following were mentioned as issues which might exist on almost any American campus:

1. The university's non-academic records policy

2. The availability of grades to draft boards

3. The disposal of funds solicited in a campus charity drive

4. The membership of the board of trustees

5. The investment of university endowment funds

6. The condition of housing, land, etc. owned by the university (slum lordship) and the common process of arranging to have land condemned so that the university may expand.

In discussing means of establishing contact among "rebel editors" at various campuses, we decided that multiple copies(12) of each insurgent paper produced should be sent to the Southern Project office and that that office would send these out to the various participating campuses. It was suggested that editors might want to receive the UCM South Africa Committee newsletter and the American Friends Service Committee mailings on National Legislation.

Miss Joan Buffington and Mr. Bob Dewart reported on a conference called by the UCM in Ann Arbor to discuss the possibilities of a "left student press service" and the possibility for a unified publication from the "new left", possibly a weekly newspaper.

Saturday evening's session to put out a newsletter degenerated; a good time was had by all.

Compiled from the notes of
Mrs. Jan Kernodle

The December, 1966 New South Student marks the first conscious attempt to present to our readers a thematic issue, involving several articles which explore one subject.

We decided that this type of presentation might be more comprehensive than one or two scattered articles, and would provide a forum to open more serious thought about vital contemporary issues.

The Black Power controversy has stirred all segments of American life. Movement people have had to re-evaluate their roles as agents of social change.

Anger over the slogan has clouded the fundamental issues behind it. It is in hopes of sharpening our anger-fogged focus that we present the several articles related to the Black Power controversy.

And as a Black American, I make no apology for the decidedly pro-Black tone.

CAGING THE PANTHER
NO CLOUDS IN THE SKY
LET THE FACTS SPEAK

CAGING THE PANTHER

by Janet Dewart

A favorite game of politicians has consisted of pretending not to comprehend the November 8th elections in Alabama and Mississippi that saw black after black defeated in heavily black districts. Most political observers should know exactly what happened. These elections just gave further proof that the white power structure refuses to passively relinquish its stolen goods to the poor and powerless. "Democracy" can be seen as a euphemism for the manipulation by the few for the political, economic and social enslavement of the many.

For those people who honestly question what happened, this article tries to provide some valid reasons for the disappointing results.

The Intimidation

Besides the usual political maneuvering, a more subtle form of intimidation claimed its share of victims. For example, the Calhoun-Letohatchie precinct in Lowndes County had four federal watchers. Out of a total of eight county officials for two voting booths, three were black, while the white minority had a total of five. The distribution for county officials was: one black and three white at one booth; and two black, nine white at another. Voters were allowed to receive aid in the booth from an assistant. If a friend had not accompanied the voter, he was required to have two assistants, one local and one federal. The odds were obviously stacked so that many blacks, had to vote in the presence of whites, a serious situation when one remembers the continuous evictions and harrassment.

An Incident

And one must question the fact that at one polling station, the supply of certificates for assistance was exhausted less than two hours after the polls opened. Was this merely the result of negligence? There is reason to doubt that very much. It should have been obvious that many folks might be wary of voting for the first time and would seek all aid available. These certificates had to be completed in order for votes to be cast. When these certificates mysteriously ran out, some kind white person offered to go to the courthouse and get a new supply. This person was gone for about an hour while black working folks stood around waiting. Some people had to return to work and never did have an opportunity to vote. Whether this incident was intentional or not, the reality is that people were prevented from voting.

Other factors which contributed to the defeat of the Lowndes County Freedom Organization are treated in the following article by Gwen Patton, which hints at the corrupt nature of white power. If you understand this corruption, you may understand that one need for black power is to make white power more human.

NO CLOUDS IN THE SKY

A DIALOGUE

by Gwendolyn Patton

The polls opened at 8 am, but black folks were there at 7 to make sure that they cast their ballots for those candidates who hopefully may take them out of their "fundamental trick bag". Lowndes County--Black Power--later to be corrupted by white power. Black folks were anxious and frightened.

"Remember, we are the second lever." "'Pull the Black Panther lever and go on home'".

"Ask the black sisters to hope you in the booth."

So the conversations went on like this for the greater part of the morning.

"Us folks sho' are coming out. Folks want to vote."

"I'm seventy-five and I feel like I've been born again".

"De Lawd sho' want us to vote cause dere ain't a cloud in the sky."

The lady was right. . . there was not a cloud in the sky. When it looked as though it would rain that lucky ole sun beamed relentlessly upon the heads of first-class citizens.

Black folks walked, rode in trucks and cars to the polls. All of them trying to remember the instructions given them the night before at the mass meeting. Some of the new citizens had to be carried because they couldn't walk; others had to be led because they couldn't see. Many were around because they had not registered and wanted so desparately to be citizens, to be a man like their neighbors, to be a part of the "American Dream".

Brenton, a predominantly black precinct, was running smoothly. No trouble...not a cloud in the sky. It was a family reunion, a town's meeting. Folks were "hoping" one another, and feeling for the first time in their lives "American".

"There's trouble in Sandy Ridge".

The conversations changed as the morning progressed. Trouble seemed to be everywhere, and even though there were no clouds in the sky, white lightening was striking everywhere and on every black man.

"I saw Jim Clark."

"White folks ridin' round with guns."

"My boss evicted me because I wanted to vote."

"Black boy, don't come back to Lowndesboro 'cause we is gonna git ya."

"Dese white foks sho' got something up 'cause dey is too quiet."

"Why is the Alabama troopers here?"

"White folks lined across the street from the city hall; dey waitin' fo' somethin'".

"Look at the nazi sign above the courthouse."

"I'm scared!!!"

"Man, you got your shit?"

"Naw, there ain't a cloud in the sky."

The man is right, but there were clouds, god-fearing, gloomy, death-like clouds.

over every black man in Lowndes County. If they win white folks will kill them; if they lose the klan will take license to kill the uppity niggers, the bad niggers. There wasn't a cloud in the sky.

Is Lowndes County, this creation by black people, destroyed by white power another episode in the book entitled, Human Dignity? There seem to be clouds everywhere.

The Black Panther candidates lost. WHY? The results were:

Black Panther Candidates

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Sheriff | Sidney Logan | 1,426 |
| Coroner | Emory Ross | 1,391 |
| Tax Assessor | Alice Moore | 1,557 |
| Tax Collector | Frank Miles | 1,556 |
| Bd. of Educ. | Robert Logan | 1,620 |
| | John Hinson | 1,620 |
| | Willie Strickland | 1,552 |

Democratic Candidates

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Sheriff | Frank Tyals | 1,943 |
| Coroner | Jack Golson | 1,901 |
| Tax Assessor | Charlie Sullivan | 2,234 |
| Tax Collector | Iva Sulivan | 2,227 |
| Bd. of Educ. | David Lyons | 1,894 |
| | Tommie Coleman | 1,933 |
| | C. B. Haigler | 2,139 |

How can they lose? How can our black candidates lose in a county of 81.4% black? How did Mr. Logan get 164 votes in this precinct and Mrs. Moore only got 64 votes in the same precinct? Don't cry. HOW DID WE LOSE?

"My voting machine did not make "x", but they said I voted anyway."

"Its some folks from Tuscaloosa voting in our county, white folks."

"Miss Ann voted from Montgomery. She lives in Montgomery, but she votes in Lowndes County."

"Miss Ann voted for her dead husband."

"Will you hope me cause ain't nothing but white folks in dere?"

"I is too scared to 'challenge' white folks; I knows dey cheating."

"I ax the federal watcher to let the Negro woman hope me, but he pointed to the white official."

"My boss told me to pull the first lever down and go home."

"Man, we is the second lever."

"Mr. Charlie voted twenty times cause he voted fo' all the black folks on his plantation."

"Man, white folks are stealing the election. You got your shit."

"Naw, there ain't a cloud in the sky."

Lowndes County is a foreign country, full of black people, controlled by white people from Johnson on down. Did Johnson and his boys in the Democratic Party have a meeting to make certain that black people don't win the election? Is Lowndes County the example to show niggers that they better stay in their "places"? Johnson, is that what you are trying to articulate? Is that what you call democracy?

There were not reporters like there were at Wallace's headquarters. Was it because the white folks had conspired together and did not want reporters to relate to the public their cheating, their stealing of the elections?....Is the political struggle of black people anything in this country? It is thundering now. There is no place to go, no homes, no farms, no lands. . . NO CLOUDS IN THE SKY.

So it was. A beautiful day in Lowndes County, Alabama. God controlled the skies, but the white man determined the clouds, the lightening, the thundering.. ....and the victims. Who controls the silver lining?

"Man, you got your shit?"

"Naw, ain't no clouds in the sky."

Election day was over, and night began to fall. There were no clouds in the sky, but the white man's clouds began to thicken as the night grew darker.

"A black man got whipped by a white cop for challenging. He had to go to the hospital out of town."

People gathered at the Lowndes County Freedom Organization Headquarters to discuss protection for the women, for the children, and especially for the candidates.

"Man, you got your shit?"

"YEAH! There seems to be white clouds everywhere groping for black men in the dark. We have to stop that to make certain that there "ain't a cloud in the sky."

"Man, we better go home and get our shit together because we have to control that silver lining."

Author's note: For those who are concerned about what happened in Lowndes County, here it is in the language of the people, the black people of Lowndes County.

LET THE FACTS DECIDE

This November 29th press release by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee forms the third part in this Lowndes County Story. It tells more of the harrassment of those seeking black power through the ballot, and the racism of those who seek to deny the blacks their rights. It also shows the determination of a unified group whose thirst for freedom can only be quenched by its acquisition.

As a follow-up to the November 8th elections in that state (Alabama), and as a result of black people voting in those elections for the first time in their lives, the white landowners are retaliating by evicting large masses of black farm workers from their land.

In Greene County, the Greene County Freedom Organization reports that there have been a series of evictions, resulting in 70 families being evicted from the land which has been their only home for years. Some families have been given a deadline for moving on December 3rd and others on January 1st. Meetings and discussions are currently underway among black people there to decide on necessary steps and remedies to deal with this problem.

In Lowndes County, several families have already been evicted from their homes and are now living in tents. Many more families expect eviction notices after the picking season is over. The Lowndes County Christian Movement in conjunction with the Lowndes County Freedom Party is now in the process of purchasing land and building houses for these people. The movement so far has 2 houses, has bought land for 2 families, and has begun construction on 2 houses which they hope to have finished within this week.

Besides the evictions, there have been brutal attacks by Lowndes County whites on black people who participated in the November 8th elections, one of the worst cases being the beating of Andrew Jones who was hospitalized with a skull fracture for 2 days in Selma. The Lowndes County Freedom Party is moving in the direction where they can gain complete control over the county in the next 2 years, and are also moving to an economic position where they will be able to take care of people who work in the movement there. Present plans include raising money to buy enough land for the dispossessed and starting a co-op which they hope will be operating in the near future.

MAN FROM MISSISSIPPI

I'm a man from Mississippi;
I'm a good God fearin' man.
Go to church 'most ev'ry Sunday
And I'm a member of the Klan.

REFRAIN:
Yea, forever segregation
Nay, and never integration.
There's a nigger, pull the trigger!
Shoot that black man in the back.

For my work I dig deep ditches.
Be you black or be you jew,
Be you doctor or a lawyer
I'm a better man than you.

I kill communists and niggers;
Yes, I kill and wound and fight.
Oh, I only finished third grade
But I'm better 'cause I'm white.

I burn crosses and bomb churches
And I'll go and get my gun
'Fore I'll let some crummy nigger
In a school sit by my son.

When I die I know that Heaven
Is the place I'm gonna go;
But if God is dark, I tell you
I would rather go below.

MEDITATIONS

of a

WHITE SOUTHERNER

by Lon Clay Hill

For the past few years, I and many others have been attracted to SNCC because of its courage, the honesty of its anger, its unwillingness to compromise, its refusal to be distracted by irrelevant ideological warfare, and its romanticism. Some whites have committed an irrevocable part of themselves to its work--and both SDS and SSOC have emerged much under its influence. This very strength, however, has meant that many militant whites have allowed the black members of SNCC to define their role within the movement--particularly within the Negro community.

A Decision

While whites have had to depend upon others to introduce them into the Negro community and many of us naturally chose SNCC, whites in the movement must learn to make their own judgments about the dark community just as they are already making their own judgments about the business community, the university community, and the war machine. Our friends and lovers can be our worst enemies, and revolutions are a particularly self-destructive form of behavior generally consuming their most principled members.

There are no guarantees against such dangers; one just has to be aware that they exist and deal with them as best he can when they happen. It is in this spirit that I wish to talk about "black nationalism"--at times with special reference to SNCC ideas and attitudes, but more basically concerned simply with developing a perspective that is functional for a WHITE RADICAL.

One of the essentials of revolutionary activity is that a person must know something about the forces that surround him--"WHERE HE IS AT". In a revolutionary situation, the premium for this type of self-knowledge is high, often outweighing other considerations that are just as important morally. Thus Trotsky helped pave his own downfall before a ruthless, rather unexciting tyrant, because he was blind to the destructive potential of his situation. More concretely, this means for us that whites can never be totally committed to an exclusively Negro or "black" revolution. Or that Northern radicals generally are not as committed to the creation of a New South as the southern radicals who will continue to live there. That is to say that while altruism may be possible, PURE altruism or an altruism without reference to the needs of the self is hypocritical and transparently self-deceptive.

Now if whites do not have some sort of workable distinction between their necessarily limited commitment to an exclusively "Negro" cause and a commitment to the freedom of the total human community, they face real difficulties.

First of all, the white person appoints a black "leader" who directs the white in his struggle to help his dark mentor's people. The white person quite naturally chooses the person who gives him the most psychological and spiritual compensation for his commitment. Whether this compensation takes the form of praise and appreciation, long sympathetic conversations, or a few bitter remarks about race which can be forgiven as due to "the problem"-- it does not create enough mutual respect to be enduring.

A Conflict of Terms

Before dealing directly with any more of the concrete issues of whites in the movement, however, it might be helpful to try to shift the terms of the ideological battles now in process. Particularly the polemics about "black nationalism vs. integration" tend to obscure as well as clarify the issues. I would like to indicate some of the realities which I see behind these phrases. If we are going to be angry, and some of us are very angry, we ought to at least clear the self-righteous smog of battle so that our anger is focused on the right object.

The word "integration" has sometimes been used to indicate the fact that Negoes and whites in this country share an allegiance to the ideals of the Declaration of Independence, they share some common religious traditions, they have common ancestors, and they should share the land and its produce.

On the other hand, "black nationalism" tends to emphasize that most of the people in the world are poor and colored, and that it makes no sense to integrate into white society unless the United States is willing to integrate into the rest of the world. So far white America has shown little inclination for such integration, pursuing an intransigent course of exploitation and murder in Latin America, South Africa, and South Vietnam. Furthermore, integration in this country has been reserved for only a few Negroes--often at dear expense.

The danger in pursuing "integration" is that one compromises his demands and vision by an over-accommodation to the power of white America. Thus, Roy Wilkins refuses to criticize the war in Vietnam because he does not want to jeopardize his standing with the White House. Of course, Negroes are "over-represented" in Vietnam and there will be no meaningful War on Poverty as long as the War in Vietnam continues, so his standing with Johnson is politically as well as ethically foolish. The danger in pursuing "black nationalism" is an ethical despair which tends to substitute the coming revolution of the colored masses for serious grappling with present injustice.

The Nonviolent Approach

"Black nationalism" is an increasingly articulate and voluble rejection of non-violence as an answer to the Negroes' problems. Which really sort of begs the question, since non-violence is not so much a way of getting rid of your own problems as it is a way of making other peoples' problems your own.

Part of the confusion about non-violence is rooted in the person and image of Martin Luther King. King has discovered that there are times when non-violence can have an immediate and pragmatic significance. But he projects this discovery beyond the point of honest expectation. King, at times, has been so anxious to prevent Negroes from being violent that he has supported the use of the National Guard to restore "law and order". This posture of non-violence for Negroes may only help some Negroes to a sense of moral superiority, but it certainly does not prevent riots.

Double Jeopardy

Nor does King do any service to his white allies and brothers by mollifying and shielding them from the frustration and anger of his black brothers. The white liberal has been helped to feel that if he does something (say, support another civil rights bill, donate money to SCLC or SNCC, join a demonstration), then everything will be all right. As if there were not irrevocable deeds, that the average Negro does not harbor deep-seated hatred or resentment, that our black brothers are waiting for us with open arms--while we of course have a job opening for him, and our grandchildren may even intermarry. But there is no way to make "all right" a situation that has festered for centuries.

A distinction needs to be made between a general historical trend and our individual responsibility within the context of that trend. Whites have robbed and raped and murdered Negroes for years --and they cannot escape the consequences of their deeds. Not that whites were the only wrongdoers--slavery was established with the active assistance of African slavetraders and Negro overseers. But the record is clear enough--and the victims and their descendants have not forgotten it.

Fundamental Issues

The issue, however, is not whether whites will be killed or whether Negroes should be non-violent or whether there will be a race war. The reality is that people will be killed, whether they be brown or black or white. And murder is still murder whatever the justification or frustration. The role of the revolutionary is not so much to bring about change as to midwife the change so that the birth of the new society does not generate all the diseases of the old.

If this ideological backdrop has any validity, then perhaps we can be a little more clear about some of the real issues involved for whites working within Negro communities. I am not going to argue whether whites should or should not work in Negro communities, because that sort of question is too abstract. The movement tends to become ghettos of isolated revolutionaries--and political ideologies tend to guise very personal and even petty conflicts which have very little to do with race or economics. What such people as Stokely Carmichael or Malcolm X say is important--whites should understand it and learn from it, and make their own decisions about it. But for most of the whites in the movement, the problem has not been their political sophistication, but their difficulties in living and working with the particular Negroes they are supposed to be assisting. And it is of these problems I wish to speak.

One reason which should not move whites to work within Negro communities is their alienation from white society. The fact that one is critical of white society does not imply that one is necessarily for Negroes. Whites have been working out their frustrations on dark people for a long time, and doing it in the name of civil rights does not make it any better. Likewise, it is not enough to work out of a sense of guilt. Whites have a responsibility for what other whites have done, but no single white can atone for all the wrongs of 300 years--which is to say that it is not enough to feel guilt or anger or alienation about the mistreatment of Negroes in white America, but that you must be clear about the relevance of those emotions to your specific tasks.

A New Awareness

One of the results of the changing mood within the Negro community is that dark men and women are trying to recover their dignity and independence and manhood and womanness, and they have reached out to assert themselves. So that quite apart from the fact that most whites know very little about Negro communities, a white person has to eschew the sort of leadership which reinforces patterns of Negroes following the white man.

There is a reason why whites cannot "organize" Negro communities in the sense that black organizers do. What the white must do is open channels of communication between black and white communities. Whereas a black organizer tends to build the internal strength of the dark community.

At this point, SNCC's notion of independent organizing in the black and white communities veers toward abstraction. Since there have never been totally separate black and white communities, the problem is not so much to create an independent base and identity for black people as to change the terms of the deep cultural and physical interdependence which will continue to exist. Thus if the movement is serious about a coalition of poor whites and blacks, then tangible as well as ideological evidence of this concern must be forthcoming.

Toward Validity

There is not much that any single white can do to save a civilization so bent upon its own destruction and inauthenticity. Some of its genuine achievements can be salvaged and shared with the rest of the world. Some perhaps, of the stolen goods can be returned. But this cannot be done within the context of "white" civilization. Only if white civilization opens itself to the poor and colored of the earth, will its own achievements have validity, and once white civilization does that, it will no longer be "white".

It is not hard to forgive the wary and fearful eyes of strangers riveted to your skin. You can understand why people lie to you and even why dark friends and acquaintances misunderstand you. After all, we do live in a historical context, and even committed whites have made their share of mistakes and wrongs. Still there are limits to how much white peoples' culpability exonerates Negroes of responsibility, and here I am going to be more personal.

The Frustrations

For me it can be terribly frustrating to listen to some dark people talk on and on about "the white man", as if there had never been cruelty by blacks...

Although my own skin is white, I DO know that white men are cruel, that the rent is much too high, and that too many dark babies die. And I know that the storekeeper called your child "nigger", and a white man asked where he could get some black pussy. But I also know that I love some of those people who hate you and reject me and are murdering their own humanity.

Still, the question I'm asking (though I don't know how to verbalize it with dark people whose wise minds distrust words, especially when spoken by whites) is: Do we have anything to share besides our pain?

Continuing the Struggle

Every white person who works within a black community faces some of these frustrations. Indeed it is impossible for anyone to work effectively against oppression without taking upon himself some of the frustration of the oppressed. Committed whites must neutralize these negative forces so that constructive work can continue. My own work is simplified by the fact that I work mostly with children. Even though the children are under essentially the same social pressures as their parents, children do not express them in explicit racial terms. I would also argue that those whites who have done the most significant work have been those who were not in competitive or racial roles; they did not do a job that dark people could, or felt that they could do. In any case, there is no place where you can escape the pain of your dark brothers or the fatuity and more covert pain of your white brothers.

WOKE UP THIS MORNING WITH MY MIND SET ON FREEDOM

by John Beecher

A flood of song breaches the levee swamps cabins in the cotton sweeps Natchez-under-the-hill

The flock escapes old shepherds who in the dust of the stampede incredulous and dazed lumber along out of breath

Frock coats and crinolines built nothing here but skilled black hands reared all this beauty

Which one of these white-colonnaded bastions of the ancient lie
Among moss-oaks and magnolias will be our Freedom House?

NORTH NASHVILLE PROJECT

THE TRANSITION

by Fred Brooks

"We are convinced that the only meaningful way to help people is to help them to help themselves. It is only through realizing power to make decisions affecting their own lives that men are able to live in dignity and to give meaning to the democratic process." --The North Nashville Project Staff

The North Nashville Project has just gone through a transitional stage and is now in the process of revitalizing its program.

What happened to the North Nashville Project is the same thing that happened to integrated projects in black communities when the term "Black Power" shook the entire world this summer. Community organizers, both black and white, stopped to take this slogan into consideration. They found that there was a great deal of validity in the ideas behind it. It is now widely believed that if the people in the community are going to control their destiny, they must control those factors which influence it.

The Image

The image that an organization develops in a community is very important. This means that blacks must organize blacks. White organizers reinforce the power structure because they unconsciously give support to the false notion that whites are superior.

Repairing the Damage

Any black worker following whites knows that the psychological effect of white organizers is so detrimental that it often negates any good that they have tried to accomplish. Whites who insist on remaining in black communities should really question their motives for remaining there. Most of them cannot admit that they believe that they are more qualified than black workers, and feel that they must show blacks that they are oppressed, and then tell them to fight that oppression.

Black folks know more about oppression than any other group in America. They have suffered a long apprenticeship. It is absurd that white folks do not realize that we are not happy. We are angry. And we are determined to channel that anger into effective programs in the black community.

Staff Agreement

The staff of the North Nashville Project is in agreement with the ideas that I have just presented. During this transitional stage in our development, we will seek a broader base in the black community for our program of tutorials, recreation, and classes in math, art, and Negro history.

During this month of December, we will continue to work on building a more effective program. We intend to be back in full swing by the first of January, with the volunteer aid of black students who have expressed a real desire to work in the Project.

December is also to be dedicated to fundraising so that we can resume our work with financial burdens largely removed. We would ask for those who wish to aid in our financial support, or who are seeking information to write:

QUOTES FROM

POWER AND RACISM

by Stokely Carmichael

"One of the tragedies of the struggle against racism is that up to now there has been no national organization which could speak to the growing militancy of young black people in the urban ghetto. There has been only a civil rights movement, whose tone of voice was adapted to an audience of liberal whites. It served as a sort of buffer zone between them and angry young blacks. None of its so-called leaders could go into a rioting community and be listened to. In a sense, I blame ourselves--together with the mass media--for what has happened in Watts, Harlem, Chicago, Cleveland, Omaha. Each time the people in those cities saw Martin Luther King get slapped, they became angry; when they saw four little black girls bombed to death, they were angrier; and when nothing happened, they were steaming. We had nothing to offer that they could see except to go out and be beaten again. We helped to build their frustration.

Not A Buffer

"An organization which claims to speak for the needs of a community--as does the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee--must speak in the tone of that community, not as somebody else's buffer zone. This is the significance of black power as a slogan. For once, black people are going to use the words they want to use--not just the words whites want to hear. And they will do this no matter how often the press tried to stop the use of the slogan by equating it with racism or separatism.

"An organization which claims to be working for the needs of a community--as SNCC does--must work to provide that community with a position of strength from which to make its voice heard. This is the significance of black power beyond the slogan.

A Clarification

"Black power can be clearly defined for those who do not attach the fears of white America to their questions about it. We should begin with the basic fact that black Americans have two problems: they are poor and they are black. All other problems arise from this two-sided reality: lack of education, the so-called apathy of black men. Any program to end racism must address itself to that double reality.

"Almost from its beginning, SNCC sought to address itself to both conditions with a program aimed at winning political power for impoverished southern blacks. We had to begin with politics because black Americans are a propertyless people in a country where property is valued above all. We had to work for power, because this country does not function by morality, love, and nonviolence, but by power. Thus we determined to win political power, with the idea of moving on from there into activity that would have economic effects. With power, the masses could MAKE OR PARTICIPATE IN MAKING the decisions which govern their destinies, and thus create basic change in their day-to-day lives...

"Politically, black power means what it has always meant to SNCC: the coming-together of black people to elect representatives and TO FORCE THOSE REPRESENTATIVES TO SPEAK TO THEIR NEEDS. It does not mean merely putting black faces into office. A man or woman who is black and from the slums cannot be automatically expected to speak to the needs of black people. Most of the black politicians we see around the country today are not what SNCC means by black power. The power must be that of a community, and emanate from there...

We Have Found You Out

"Ultimately, the economic foundations of this country must be shaken if black people are to control their lives. The colonies of the United States--and this includes the black ghettos within its borders, north and south--must be liberated. For a century, this nation has been like an octopus of exploitation, its tentacles stretching from Mississippi and Harlem to South America, the Middle East, southern Africa, and Vietnam; the form of exploitation varies from area to area but the essential result has been the same--a powerful few have been maintained and enriched at the expense of the poor and voiceless colored masses. This pattern must be broken. As its grip loosens here and there around the world, the hopes of black Americans become more realistic. For racism to die, a totally different America must be born.

"This is what the white society does not wish to face; this is why that society prefers to talk about integration. But integration speaks not at all to the problem of poverty, only to the problem of blackness. Integration today means the man who 'makes it,' leaving his black brothers behind in the ghetto as fast as his new sports car will take him. It has no relevance to the Harlem wino or to the cottonpicker making three dollars a day. As a lady I know in Alabama once said, 'the food that Ralph Bunche eats doesn't fill my stomach.'

"Integration, moreover, speaks to the problem of blackness in a despicable way. As a goal, it has been based on complete acceptance of the fact that IN ORDER TO HAVE a decent house or education, blacks must move into a white neighborhood or send their children to a white school. This reinforces, among both black and white, the idea that 'white' is automatically better and 'black' is by definition inferior. This is why integration is a subterfuge for the maintenance of white supremacy. It allows the nation to focus on a handful of southern children who get into white schools, at a great price, and to ignore the 94% who are left behind in unimproved all-black schools. Such situations will not change until black people have power--to control their own school boards, in this case. Then Negroes become equal in a way that means something, and integration ceases to be a one-way street. Then integration doesn't mean draining skills and energies from the ghetto into white neighborhoods; then it can mean white people moving from Beverly Hills into Watts, white people joining the Lowndes County Freedom Organization. Then integration becomes relevant...

Burn, Baby, Burn

"To most whites, black power seems to mean that the Mau Mau are coming to the suburbs at night. The Mau Mau are coming, and whites must stop them. Articles appear about plots to 'get Whitey', creating an atmosphere in which 'law and order must be maintained.' Once again, responsibility is shifted from the oppressor to the oppressed. Other whites chide, 'Don't forget--you're only 10% of the population; if you get too smart, we'll wipe you out.' If they are liberals, they complain, 'what about me?--don't you want my help any more?' These are people supposedly concerned about black Americans, but today they think first of themselves, of their feelings of rejection. Or they admonish, 'you can't get anywhere without coalitions,' when there is in fact no group at present with whom to form a coalition in which blacks will not be absorbed and betrayed...

The Problem of Color

"White America will not face the problem of color, the reality of it. The well-intended say: 'We're all human, everybody is really decent, we must forget color.' But color cannot be 'forgotten' until its weight is recognized and dealt with...

"The need for psychological equality is the reason why SNCC today believes that blacks must organize in the black community. Only black people can convey the revolutionary idea that black people are able to do things themselves. Only they can help create in the community an aroused and continuing black consciousness that will provide the basis for political strength...

"This does not mean we don't welcome help or friends. But we want the right to decide whether anyone is, in fact, our friend. In the past, black Americans have been almost the only people whom everybody and his momma could jump up and call their friends. We have been takens, symbols, objects--as I was in high school to many young whites, who liked having 'a Negro friend.' We want to decide who is our friend, and we will not accept someone who comes to us and says: 'If you do X, Y, and Z, then I'll help you'...

On Liberal Whites

"I have said that most liberal whites react to 'black power' with the question 'What about me?' rather than saying: 'Tell me what you want me to do and I'll see if I can do it.' There are answers to the right question. One of the most disturbing things about almost all white supporters of the movement has been that they are afraid to go into their own communities--which is where the racism exists--and work to get rid of it. They want to run from Berkeley to tell us what to do in Mississippi; let them look instead at Berkeley. They admonish blacks to be nonviolent; let them preach nonviolence in the white community. They come to teach me Negro history; let them go to the suburbs and open up freedom schools for whites. Let them work to stop America's racist foreign policy; let them press this government to cease supporting the economy of South Africa.

And Poor Whites

"There is a vital job to be done among poor whites. We hope to see, eventually, a coalition between poor blacks and poor whites. That is the only coalition which seems acceptable to us, and we see such a coalition as the major internal instrument of change in American society. SNCC has tried several times to organize poor whites; we are trying again now, with an initial training program in Tennessee. It is purely academic today to talk about bringing poor blacks and whites together, but the job of creating a poor-white power bloc must be attempted. The main responsibility for it falls upon whites.

A Humanistic Vision

"Our vision is not merely of a society in which all black men have enough to buy the good things of life. When we urge that black money go into black pockets, we mean the communal pocket. We want to see the cooperative concept applied in business and banking. We want to see black ghetto residents demand that an exploiting landlord or store keeper sell them, at minimal cost, a building or a shop that they will own and improve cooperatively; they can back their demand with a rent strike, or a boycott, and a community so unified behind them that no one else will move into the building or buy at the store. The society we seek to build among black people, then, is not a capitalist one. It is a society in which the spirit of community and humanistic love prevail.

"We can build a community of love only where we have the ability and power to do so; among blacks...

Conclusion

"As for white America, perhaps it can stop crying out against 'black supremacy,' 'black nationalism,' 'racism in reverse' and begin facing reality. The reality is that this nation, from top to bottom, is racist; that racism is not primarily a problem of 'human relations' but of an exploitation maintained--either actively or through silence--by the society as a whole. Camus and Sartre have asked, can a man condemn himself? Can whites, particularly liberal whites, condemn themselves? Can they stop blaming us, and blame their own system? Are they capable of the shame which might become a revolutionary emotion?

"We have found that they usually cannot condemn themselves, and so we have done it. But the rebuilding of this society, if at all possible, is basically the responsibility of whites--not blacks. We won't fight to save the present society, in Vietnam or anywhere else. We are just going to work, in the way we see fit, and on goals we define, not for civil rights but for all our human rights.

LITTÉRATURE NOIRE

A Review of

POETIC ANGER

Black anger has given rise to an exciting, if not nerve-shattering, type of literature. This littérature noire is exciting because its heartbeat is the fresh one of a revived people who were being choked to death by vicarious absorption into a society that rejected them. It is as nerve-shattering as a bullet to the heart because it points an accusing finger at white folks, saying that none of them have done enough to eliminate the causes for the anger.

Littérature noire is the ghetto song of the "block guy" who has stopped asking "whitey" to remove the white feet from his black throat. He is pulling those feet off.

Of the angry black men, LeRoi Jones is the angriest and probably the most popular. His popularity stems from the fact that what has been referred to as "horror stories for the white liberals" are written in a precise, tense and very readable fashion.

If whites can understand the totality of his anger, there might be hope left.

Dutchman and The Slave (William Morrow and Company, N.Y., 1960) are two plays which clearly indict white society. Their tone is so similar that this quote from the Dutchman can serve as a sampling for both. The protagonist says in an anger drenched with weariness:

> ...Let them alone. Let them sing curses at you in code and see your filth as simple lack of style. Don't make the mistake through some irresponsible surge of Christian charity, of talking too much about the advantages of Western rationalism, or maybe they'll begin to listen. And then, maybe one day, as sure as shit, when you really believe you can "accept" them into your fold, as half-white trusties late of the subject peoples. With no more blues, except the very old ones, and not a watermelon in sight, the great missionary heart will have triumphed, and all of those ex-coons will be stand-up Western men, with eyes for clean and useful lives, sober, pious and sane, and they'll murder you. They'll murder you, and have very rational explanations. Very much like your own. They'll cut your throats, and drag you out to the edge of your cities so the flesh can fall from your bones, in sanitary isolation.

BLACK POWER

and

WHITE ORGANIZING

by Anne Braden

One of the very good effects that has come with the call for Black Power from the freedom movement is that today more people are recognizing the necessity to organize in the white community.

Some of us have been saying for a long time that this is a necessity--and to its everlasting credit, SSOC people were among those who saw this before it became a popular concept. Now there is much more general acceptance of the idea.

We have SNCC to thank for this, of course. Stokely Carmichael has been quoted as saying SNCC is not interested in saving this country, it just wants to save black people. But it may well be that if SNCC does the correct things to save black people, it will save the rest of us as a by-product.

A Call For Change

Certainly when SNCC began saying it was useless to talk about coalitions because there were no meaningful white groups to coalesce with, many white people began to see they had not been doing their homework. When SNCC told its white organizers they could not work effectively in black communities, it may have been thinking mainly of what was best for those communities. But in the process, it forced a lot of people to examine themselves and their role in the movement; at least some of them are turning to the work they should have done long ago, organizing the white community for social change.

I think this trend is moving so firmly now that we need not belabor the theory of it. We have now reached the point where we need to deal in the practicalities of how we will go about this thing of organizing white people.

In this, I am referring mainly to organizing poor white people. Many of us have long been trying to organize middle class white people to support the freedom movement--and not totally without some breakthroughs. But we always knew that if we really wanted to create a new South, we who believed in black-white unity must also organize among the poor and disinherited whites of the South. Now for the first time in 30 years, it appears that the circumstances are ripe for doing so.

The Uncharted Road

For most of us, this is an uncharted road. This applies to the SSOC generation certainly, and also to my generation which came along in the late '40's, too late to have experience in the movements of tenant farmers and industrial workers that did reach poor white southerners in the 1930's. This means we have to learn partly by trial and experiment, and we have to expect to make some mistakes. The main point now, it seems to me, is to get this effort out of the parlor-talk stage as quickly as possible and begin to create some experiences we can learn from. In other words, let's do something--even if it turns out to be the wrong thing.

As a matter of fact, we are beginning to have a few scattered current experiences from which we can learn. SCEF had one such organizing project in East Tennessee which failed, at least for the time being, and we learned a number of things in the process. We now have pilot projects aimed at reaching poor white people in West Virginia, Kentucky, and Louisiana; we are also lending full-time staff to a similar project initiated by people in Nashville. SSOC is making some similar efforts, as are a few other scattered groups.

It is on the basis of these experiences--admittedly limited so far--that I want to point out what I think are some of the dangers we face, and some of the necessities.

Self-Awareness

First and foremost, as we move into organizing work in white communities, I think we need to remember who we are and what we are about. Virtually all of us came out of the Negro freedom movement--that is, our lives have been shaped to a large degree by this movement. We are what we are today because we became convinced that we can never have a good society in this country (or in the world) unless white people overcome their inherent racism, and build a unity of black and white to work toward mutually important goals. In other words, our work in the white community is in large part a search for a situation in which there can be a meaningful black-white alliance.

Some might say that if this is our viewpoint, we just want to "use" these white people--that their needs are not important in themselves. I don't think this is the case at all. Certainly the inherent needs of poor white people are reason enough to organize--they, like poor black people, are ill-fed, ill-housed and lacking in opportunities for education, medical care, political expression, and dignity. But I think what we are recognizing is that these white people will never be able to solve these problems unless they find ways to unite with the black movement seeking the same things. All of southern history proves this to be the case.

Unless we are continuously aware of this basic fact and necessity--I think we can make some very serious mistakes. In many areas, white people live in their own ghettos, just as Negroes do. I can see the possibility that our organizers could become so engrossed in the problems of these neighborhoods--in the immediate day-to-day issues facing the people they are working with--that they could completely forget to raise the question of the need to seek alliances in the black communities. I can see how one might work a year or so, begin to see some results in terms of community organization among whites and come to feel he has been rather successful. He could do this and yet never have raised the matter of white racism which the white people have to overcome before they can create the social changes that will really help them.

The ultimate and worst result of such organizing, although it would never be our intention, could be the formation of new white racist groups.

Toward Coalition

It was my concern over this danger that led me to write a paper for a SSOC conference last spring suggesting that any organizing in the white community should be an effort to organize white and black together. I also suggested that, where possible, work in white communities should combine the efforts of black and white organizers.

I realize now that this may not always be possible. This is not, I am convinced, because it wouldn't work in the white communities. And right here, I'd like to correct the false rumors that are circulating that the project in East Tennessee failed because it was an effort to organize black and white together. The failure of that project had absolutely nothing to do with the black-white issue. It was for other reasons that may be worth discussing sometime, but which are not pertinent at all to this particular point.

The reason a joint black-white effort may not always be possible is that more and more there is the trend for black people to want to organize their own groups and alone. Furthermore, we have found in regard to SCEF projects, that black people who want to try to work in and with white communities are few and far between.

So I am not suggesting any rigid approach. I hope it is obvious that I am not suggesting anything so mechanical as organizers ringing doorbells in white communities and opening the conversation by saying, "I'm here to talk about white supremacy and Negro-white unity and what you can do about it." This is stupidity. Any organizer worth his salt listens a long time before he talks much, and he learns to adapt his approaches to the people he is working with and to their life situations.

Combatting Racism

What I am saying is that our organizers (and here I mean movement people, not just SCEF) need to have constantly on their minds this necessity for getting at the question of racism; they need to be looking for the opportunities to make it real to the people they are working with. We all know that white supremacist attitudes change fastest not by logical argument, but when people have new experiences. We need to be on the lookout all the time for ways in which we can create those experiences for people. We need to look for the situations in which white people need the strength that can come from alliance with black people on issues of common concern. And we need to encourage them to seek these alliances.

White Responsibility

Let us face the fact that if such alliances are built in the coming period whites are going to have to seek them. Stokely Carmichael has said that integration is irrelevant when initiated by black people, and he is probably right. In any event, this attitude is spreading among black people, and in many places they are not going to take the first step toward even temporary alliances. It is time for some initiative on this to come from the white community--and a big part of our job is to help others see the necessity for it.

Another thing those of us working in white communities are going to have to realize is that in keeping this question uppermost in our minds and efforts, we will be pretty much on our own. SNCC is not likely to be coming around reminding us of it--nor are militant black people anywhere. White people have always needed black people to nudge their consciences. From now on, we are going to have to be our own consciences, I think. This is because most militant black people won't be taking our efforts to organize poor white people very seriously. It's not that they are opposed to it; SNCC has said they want it to happen, and I think they do. But most of them don't think it is possible. So they have more important things to do. And the job of keeping the white organizing efforts on the track and geared to the goals we started with will be up to us.

The Pitfalls

There are two pitfalls I think we need to avoid.

One is the tendency to think there is some easy and painless way to combat racism in the white southerner--or in the white American anywhere. This illusion, I think, is what leads people to decide not to mention the question, to hope that unity will come someday if we don't talk about it very much. It's sort of the soft-sell approach--boiling the frog without his realizing he's being boiled.

I've been a white southerner all my life. I've seen a lot of racism, and I've seen a considerable number of people change their views. Nothing in my experience or my observation has ever led me to doubt a proposition that I consider key: that there is no easy way to get over this hump, that it must be tackled head on, that people must be confronted with the consequences of their racist views and put into a situation where they have to face the truth. Truth is painful, and people usually have to turn themselves inside out to accept it. Once they have done that, things happen. I think it's worth the pain--and the effort. Again, I'm not saying you always do this in the first conversation with somebody; it may not be a verbal approach that will work at all--it may have to be a situation where a man who has always hated Negroes suddenly knows he needs black people. But in some form, it has to be a confrontation, and it has to be painful. There is no short cut.

Continued

The other pitfall that worries me may seem to contradict the first, but I don't think it does. This is the danger of thinking most white southerners are hopeless on this question--that there is nothing that can be done about it so we should keep quiet on it if we possibly can. I've seen this attitude over and over in white organizers from the North--dating back to 20 years ago when I had some occasion to work with northern white union organizers who came South. Their present-day counterparts sometimes have the same timid approach--the feeling that race is unmentionable with the white southerner and you avoid the subject if you can.

Facts of Life

I think we who are white and southern can steer a course between these two pitfalls. We don't expect it to be easy for people to change the patterns of a lifetime. But we have more faith that it can be done. There's not a one of us in this movement who has not changed drastically from what we were when we grew up. We changed because certain experiences came into our lives. We changed not because anyone tried to protect us from the issue--or because they let it alone and figured we'd find our own way gradually if not too much was said. Most often we changed because we were confronted with the issue dramatically and had to re-think our lives.

I think we need to stop feeling, even unconsciously, that we are something special--that we could change but others someway don't quite have the intelligence or flexibility to do so.

I think we need an abiding faith that every white southerner is potentially in a state of flux--that he can go one way or the other--and that we have a responsibility to nudge history along just a bit by providing him with the opportunities to experience new things and think in new ways.

Keeping the Perspective

Unless this perspective is constantly in our minds, I have the fear that all our work in the white community--although it may address itself to some economic and political issues--will at best be the tinkling brass and the sounding cymbal. At worst, it could create some Frankenstein monsters that we will live to regret.

OUR CONTRIBUTORS

Gwendolyn Patton, 1965 student body president at Tuskegee Institute, is on the staff of the National Student Association's Southern Student Human Relations Project.

Karen Griner, class of 1970, is a student at Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee.

Fred Brooks, a senior at Tennessee State University, worked with CORE in Jonesboro, Louisian in 1964-65. He has been with the North Nashville Project since its inception a year ago.

Anne Braden, a long-time worker in the struggle for civil rights and civil liberties, is associate director of the Southern Conference Educational Fund, (SCEF) and editor of The Southern Patriot.

Lon Clay Hill, a native of Prestonsburg, Kentucky, has been working as a community organizer in New Orleans for the past two years.

Stokely Carmichael was elected chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee this past spring.

WHAT'S HAPPENIN'?

Tallahassee, Florida: The Tallahassee NAACP sponsored a very successful school holiday, November 28 and 29, which kept 71% and 72.6% of the county's black students out of school for Monday and Tuesday respectively. Florida State University and Florida Agricultural and Mechanical University students coordinated and manned freedom schools attended by some 400 children. The FSU Young Liberals and FAMU NAACP are planning future coordinated efforts on academic issues at the two universities. Contact: Phil Mullins, 439 West College Avenue, Tallahassee, Florida 32301.

Washington, D. C.: Planning is underway for a conference on radical vocations in the white community. The tentative date for the Washington meeting is the second or third week-end of February. Interested persons should contact Sue Thrasher at 1900 Florida Avenue, NW, Washington, D. C.

Atlanta, Georgia: SSOC and the NSA Southern Project co-sponsored a conference of insurgent newsletter editors on Dec. 2 and 3. To participate in the newsletter exchange program instigated by the conference, editors should send 12 copies of their publication to Bill Roberts, NSA Southern Project, 41 Exchange Place, Rm. 701, Atlanta, Georgia. A future possibility is the establishment of a southern student news service program. Write Bill for a summary of the weekend meeting.

Knoxville, Tennessee: Anne Romaine, Virginia-based SSOC staffer, coordinated a workshop at Highlander Center on Nov. 17-19 to discuss the second Southern Festival of Song to be presented in the spring of 1967. The presence of folksinger Guy Carawan and southern poet Don West made the week-end a tremendous treat for students interested in the South's cultural history. Carawan is to be one of th performers of the Festival, a SSOC-sponsored tour that last year gave 18 concerts and appeared in every southern state. Groups interested in hosting the 1967 Southern Festival of Song should contact Anne Romaine, 405 Altamont Street, Charlottesville, Virginia, (703) 296-8203.

Pine Bluff, Arkansas: A newly-organized group of students at Arkansas State AM&N plans to publish a supplement to the general college catalogue, evaluating courses, departments, and professors, and including an analysis of the regents and a comparison of course offering and Ph.D's with other schools and grad school requirements. The publication should be off the press in early February. The students are also making plans to begin work in the Pine Bluff community. Contact: Eugene Hunt, 3703 West Ninth Street, Pine Bluff, Arkansas.

Nashville, Tennessee: SNCC affiliates at Fisk and Tennessee State University are sponsoring a food and funds drive. Proceeds will be given to aid black people in Alabama who have suffered reprisals as a result of their participation in the November 8 elections. People are urged to contribute by sending funds and non-perishable food to John Hulett, President, Lowndes County Freedom Organization, Route 1, Box 191, Haynesville, Alabama.

About 14 Nashvillians gathered Dec. 3 to discuss the spiraling cost of living and what they could do about it. A representative of a recently-formed neighborhood buying co-op told of its success. The group decided to explore similar programs and to possibly join in efforts for a major food boycott. The meeting is particularly significant when one thinks in terms of a future coalition of poor whites and blacks. The people are working in their own communities, yet were able to meet on common ground to exchange sympathies and ideas.

THE TUSKEGEE INCIDENT

(Compiled from an eyewitness report by Ernest Stephens, editor of the Black Thesis, an insurgent newsletter at Tuskegee Institute, Alabama.)

On Thursday afternoon, December 8, 1966, an all-white jury acquitted Marvin Segrist, the accused slayer of Sammy Younge.

About 10:00 of that same evening, approximately 100 students met in the Tuskegee gym to propose a demonstration for the next morning in protest of the acquittal.

By midnight the group decided to turn out the campus for a demonstration that night rather than wait until the next morning. They left the gym and went around campus arousing people from their dorms. Both men and women students continued to join the group until it numbered about a thousand.

These angry folks marched downtown to the Confederate Memorial Square. After painting the statue black, a decision was made to hold another demonstration the next morning rather than hold an all-night vigil as was originally planned. Students were to be called to the gym at 9:30. Police saw everything that went on, but took no action.

The Return

Around 3:45 am the group began an orderly march back to campus. At some point while they were still in town one of the marchers threw a bottle through a store window. From that point, all store windows along the route were broken. No appropriation of merchandise was reported. And no arrests were made. The students arrived back on campus at 4 am.

The President Speaks

Reports of the night's activities were on local radio and T.V. the next morning. President Foster of the Institute came in and took charge of the meeting, and declared that there would be no more demonstrations or marches. (Newspaper reports claim that Foster called the meeting, but our report says that the meeting had been already planned by students.)

He expressed concern over what had taken place the night before. The President then called his own meeting to discuss the matter on Saturday, December 10. As of this writing (on December 10th) that meeting has not occurred.

Anyone who wishes to keep in close contact with the situation in Tuskegee should call or write:

ROBERT THEOBALD

ADDRESSES

SSOC CHRISTMAS MEETING

The second annual SSOC Christmas seminar will be held at the Methodist Student Center of Duke University, December 19-21. The focus of the meeting, which is primarily designed for SSOC members, is the southern economy.

Robert Theobald, internationally known economist, writer and lecturer, will address the seminar on Monday, December 19.

The event will be preceded and followed by one day SSOC planning meetings. On Sunday, December 18, those interested in formulating programs for the SSOC summer camp in Buckeye Cove, North Carolina are to confer. A SSOC membership meeting will occur on December 22, following the seminar, to give direction to the staff for programs for the new year.

The agenda for the seminar will include:

Monday, December 19

- South as an Underdeveloped Country
- From Manual Labor to Cybernation in the South
- Agents of the Status Quo:
  - The Role of Yankee Capital
  - The Role of Organized Labor
  - The Role of the University

Tuesday, December 20

- The Role of the Government Including the Military
- The Economics of Development, Political and Economic Decentralization

Wednesday, December 21

- Agents and Programs of Change:
  - Poor Whites and Blacks
  - The Middle Class Including Students
  - The Labor Movement
  - Governmental Programs
  - Strategies of Various Movements (SNCC, SSOC, SDS, UCM, etc.)

Some additional resource persons are:

Vera Rony, writer; she is doing a history of the labor movement in the South.

Nick Levin, student, University of Florida who recently completed a study of the Florida Board of Regents.

While members receive preference in this situation where space is limited, it is possible that we may be able to accommodate you. If you are interested in attending, please call the SSOC office immediately and inquire. (615) 291-3537. The phone at Durham is (919) 286-9230.

TOWARD SOUTHERN NATIONALISM

Raising the banner of Southern Nationalism is both difficult and dangerous for one who advocates a New South. The Lerleens, Lesters, Sheltons and Eastlands leap to the mind; lynchings, poverty, pellagra, rape, states rights--the list is seemingly interminable--compel careful attention to history....This is especially true for one who would fashion a new banner from the cloth of a region which is, in fact, led by the grandsons of Henry Grady--led to beat and kneel at the heavy door of the twentieth century.

Yet those who have the power to open that door are not desirable hosts. To much of the world, the Johnsons, Rusks, Fords, Rockefellers and Engelhards are the Wallaces of the Earth. Their house is full of napalm and missiles; their minds are filled with counter-revolution; their offering of water is polluted and tepid.

But what is a new banner if it is to become a burial sheet for a people who have fought bravely for the wrong cause? Did we learn something one hundred winters ago? Can we fight again, but for those "peculiar virtues" that are vague yet real in our souls? Must we choose the traditional weapons of warfare? Can we create a full and beautiful life for all our people, our region?

Jody Palmour and I are interested in seeking answers to these and other questions that are raised by the idea of Southern Nationalism. We will co-edit the February issue of the New South Student. If you are interested in grappling with Southern Nationalism from any side, please submit an article. The deadline is February 1, 1967, the seventh anniversary of the Sit-In Movement.

Regarding: The protests at Alcorn College and calling for--

SOUTHERN EDUCATION GENERAL PROTEST

Over the past ten years there have been a series of protests by students of Alcorn A&M College, Lorman, MIssissippi. The have occured in massive scale roughly every two years. The protests have been around university reform and against the doctrine of in loco parentis. Though it is the oldest Negro landgrant school in the country, it is perhaps the worst and most oppressive institution of "higher" education in the nation. Unfortunately, however, many other schools are vying for a very close second--Alcorn is but a caricature of southern education in general--not of Negro education, but of southern education. Attention, therefore, must be focused on all our schools and the absenee ofquality education. More importantly, we must consider the question WHO DECIDES? Not just the dorm or library hours, but on courses, on professors, on books that go in the library, etc., etc. Many colleges have small eruptions over a number of issues--but seldom, if ever, are the radical and substantive questions that revolve around WHO DECIDES really asked by any of us. Mainly, we ask "mommie and daddy" to be more lenient.

The Southern Student Organizing Committee is calling for a period of Southern Education General Protest to be held April 27 thru 29 (Wednesday thru Friday). We welcome participation by schools throughout the South and the nation. Enclosed is a fact sheet on Alcorn; several suggested leaflets; and a list of things you can do that, hopefully, are meaningful and constructive. More information will follow.

It must be borne in mind that the students at Alcorn are not asking us to help them with a diffucult situation; at their "poor little Mississippi black school." Rather they are setting an example for us to follow. We must relate what they are trying to do to our own deplorable conditions. They aren't waiting for someone to "lead them to freedom." We, likewise, must not wait.

FACTS ON ALCORN

The catalogue of Alcorn A&M College in Lorman, Mississippi proclaims the college objective as being "to prepare students to live fully, effectively, graciously and cooperatively in a democratic society while serving the people in the state." In the past few weeks the Alcorn campus has once again erupted in a series of demonstrations in an attempt to prevail upon the administration and the state to live up to its stated goals.

The student complaints comprise a catalogue quite different from the official one. Included are library hours, now limited on weekdays to 8:30 PM, on Saturdays until noon, and none on Sundays; the 9:30 dorm curfew for all women seven days a week, regardless of class; and a prohibition on male students meeting dates at their dorms. These grievances, along with students not being told the price of books they were required to buy and poor laundry service, had prompted the April 1964 Alcorn "sit-out", which led to the suspension of 1000 students, two thirds of the student body at that time.

Despite the extent of the 1964 protests, none of its causes have yet been eliminated. The present student outbursts were begun by the Student Movement of Alcorn College (SMAC), which listed 32 complaints including those of the earlier protests plus the low pay of campus employees, now averaging an estimated $17 for a full week's work.

As well as the demand unmet after the 1964 demon strations, the Alcorn students pressed for a series of new reforms. They asked that the job of handling soft drink machines be taken from the Alcorn President J. D. Boyd's wife; that a more equitable student loan system be introduced; that male students be permitted to escort dates to ball games, movies, and dances; that students no longer be expelled and that faculty and employees no longer be fired for part icipating in civil rights organizations; and that faculty be prevented from making sexual advances to female students with threats of course failures.

After agitation began, the students received support from Charles Evers, NAACP field secretary. Evers called a sympathy boycott of nearby Negro grade schools, which was claimed to be 99% effective. Evers presented a petition listing the 32 student grievances to President Boyd, who told him he would give it to the college Board of Trustees. No action was taken by the college on the complaints but twenty students were expelled for participation in the demonstrations and told by the administration that their transcripts would not be forwarded to other colleges. One student was expelled for no apparent reason. It was quessed that this action was taken either because that student has a beard or because he is a member of the NAACP.

IN response to the harsh and intransigent attitude of the college administration, student demands have increased rather than lessened. They are now demanding that the State Board of Education be revised, that the 1000 students suspended in 1964 be permitted to hold student office, and that students have equal representation on the faculty-adminsitration disciplinary committee, on which there are at present no student members.

SMAC began escalting its tactics. Aboycott was called of the Student Union Building, to protest general conditions as well as exorbitant prices at the cafeteria. Several days later a wood frame building on campus was burned down by an unknown person, and cold water was poured on the bricks of an adjacent building by fire fighters which caused its destruction as well.

Because of administration efforts to crush SMAC, a new student group called United Student Movement (USM) was formed. USM put out leaflets and called for a mass meeting in the school gym, which was attened by almost the entire student body. After about 45 minutes, the dean of the college came in and dispersed the students. The following evening 600students marched to meet Charles Evers outside the campus. All but about twenty returned to the campus soon after, but were locked out of their dormitories and reported. It is believed that they will be expelled. One of the male students who was expelled that week received a letter from his draft board three days later.

Alcorn A&M is typical of what might be called a "plantation college". It was founded in 1830 but became a Negro school only after the Civil War, when whites needed an excuse for preventing Negroes from Ole Miss. This was done with the tacit approval of the federal government, which allowed Alcorn to become the first Negro land-grant college in the country in 1878.

Like all Negro state colleges, it has remained poor in facilities and faculty, to the extent that until recently its accreditation has been provisional. Even now its standards are extradinarily low, even in purely statistical areas. Ole Miss has one faculty member for each thirteen students, Alcorn has one for each twenty-two. Ole MIss has sixty books in its libraries for each student, Alcorn has fourteen for each. Alcorn offers degrees only on the bachelor of arts and trade professions level and many of its faculty lack advanced degrees. This state of affairs is only the final step in a totally inferior and almost totally segregated educational system for Mississippi Negroes. As NAACP executive secretary said in a statement regarding the Alcorn situation, "Under this system Negroes run a gamut of inferior schooling, in which each level of inadequacy is compounded by the next and it is virtually impossible for the college to be more than a pretense." The situation is further compounded in cyclical fashion since almost the only job for which Alcorn graduates are considered qualified is teaching lower grades in Negro schools.

A situation as complex as this one concerning an inferior, self-reinforcing educational system cannot be easily or quickly corrected. Some feel that the answer is immediate and complete integration. Others think the solution lies in pumping large quantites of funds into these schools for better professors, equipment, and scholarship aid. Whatever course of action is decided upon, it should not be effected without considerable thought and effort.

SUGGESTIONS FOR ACTION AROUND ALCORN SITUATION

1. Letters and Telegrams
   a. You should contact every moderate and liberal student group on campus to urge them to send a telegram or letter to one or all of the below listed people. Don't rule out student council. Especially, you should ask campus religious and protest groups, faculty committees, and in some cases even fraternities and sororities to do this. Also Young Dem's and Young Republicans. Who knows, YAF might even dig it.
   b. To whom: President J.D. Boyd, Alcorn A & M College, Lorman, Mississippi, Governor Paul B. Johnson, State Capital, Jackson, Mississippi, Congressman Adam Clayton Powell, House of Representatives, Wash. 25, Mr. Harold Howe II, Commissioner of Education, Office of Education, U.S. Dept. of Health Education and Welfare, Washington D. C.

2. Forums, Discussions, Seminars, etc.
   a. Teach-in: This could involve a debate on Southern education (if you can find anyone to defend education as it is today.) with emphasis on your own campus situation.
   b. Panel discussion of informal nature made up of students, faculty, and administration, with questions from the floor.
   c. Out-door (or in-door if preferable or weather demanding) speak-out, bitch-out, in which students get their gripes out in the open and maybe even get together on doing something about them.
   d. Open Forum: in which the president and other administration officials agree to subject themselves to questions from the student body on conditions and policy of the school. It is a sort of press conference in which the students do all the questioning as do reporters.
   e. Wailing Wall: in essence a gripe board that is used only for that. This could be initiated during this period as a permanent thing at the school. People can put their gripes in writing and pin them on the board or wall.

3. Literature Table
   Several groups have found that on the question of Vietnam a literature table set up on campus has been a good way of stimulating thought and discussion and of just letting people know by this form of demonstration that there are actively concerned people. Literature can be sold or distributed free of charge on the question of university reform and academic freedom. There is a literature list enclosed of things which SSOC has available. The prices quoted are generally for single copies and it is possible that bulk copies of some things might be supplied at cost.

4. Leafleting
   Enclosed is a suggested leaflet that is of a general information character. We suggest that you modify this to fit your own needs with the idea in mind of relating Alcorn to your school. In many ways Alcorn is, in a blatant way, your school too. Leaflets should be handed out at all busy points on campus. If there is a campus across town or next door that is not participating in this protest, then you should think of leafleting there also.

5. Demonstrations of more active nature
   Groups might want to picket their own administration building in sympathy with the students at Alcorn. At the same time conditions on your own campus can be pointed up. Some of the people might leaflet to explain the picket.

Fast: A day long or three day long fast in protest could be gotten together. People might contribute money saved to a student legal defense fund.

Sit-in: Sit-ins have been used on many campuses to protest library policies and cafeteria policies. This type of activity would be most sensibly used after other channels have been exhausted. It would be directed at your school rather than at Alcorn.

6. Have a fund-raising event to cover legal costs for Alcorn and for a general student legal defense fund. (SSOC is tax exempt and is in a position to set up such a fund.)

   Ways of doing this:
   a. A fund-raising party. At Texas the SDS group buys kegs of beer and charges people to come to a rip-snorter.
   b. Fast for student freedom (people don't eat a meal and then contribute.)
   c. Ask student groups to take up a collection.
   d. Appeal to faculty and adult groups for funds after speaking at their meetings.
   e. Collect money at booths on campus after you have educated the people
   f. Sell the buttons that we will have printed soon.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR OF FIELD ACTIVITIES
Southern Regional Council
Annual Meeting---November 16, 1966

Insofar as this report might deal with the personal activity of the Director of Field Activities, it is tempting to summarize by quoting one of the central characters from the Book of Job. Whenever the council of heaven was called, "Satan came also among them." Bach time, in answer to the question, "Whence have you come?" Satan answered the Lord, "From going to and fro on the earth, and from walking up and down on it."

Taking advantage of opportunities during my first year to acquaint myself with the region, as well as carrying out necessary duties, has carried me twice to Arkansas, three times into Tennessee, twice to Washington, D.C., and once to Virginia. I have been four times each to North and South Carolina and thrice to Florida. I have lost the count for Alabama and Mississippi, and the air lines think I commute to Louisiana. Georgia can thank my desk work for distracting me from my duties here, except for attending the annual meeting of the Georgia Council, fairly regular attendance at their executive committee meetings, and a couple of speaking engagements.

Most of these wanderings have been occasioned by some function of the state councils. As with all of the professional staff of the SRC, however, there have been responses to occasional requests and opportunities, such as attendance at the Mid-Decade Conference on Children and Youth and the White House Conference on Civil Rights; a talk on "The Nature of Prejudice" at a workshop in Mobile for the Personnel Directors of the largest Post Offices in the region; an address to the United Church Women of Huntsville and to local human relations councils in Charleston, Aiken, and Auburn; and a briefing for Y.W.C.A. executives at Lake Junaluska.

Additional travel was occasioned by special program efforts involving the field department. In the spring and early summer we cooperated with the American Friends Service Committee, the NAACP Legal Defence and Education Fund, and the several state councils in workshops on school desegregation in each of the southern states. These were held in conjunction with wider conferences sponsored by the state advisory committees to the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights. Along with John Boone, Director of SRC's Special Project on Crime and Corrections, we assisted the Fellowship of Concern and the state councils with a series of workshops on "Dual Justice in the Courts." These, too, were held in each state in the region. Mrs. Tilly will tell you more about them later in this meeting.

In the course of the year we have been called upon for other services requiring less travel, but a great deal of administrative work. We were asked to secure the names of Negro boys now in the eighth grade, a list of apt candidates from which eighteen could be selected for admission to six of the top prep schools of the South.

A more involved project has been an experiment in the distribution of paperback books among people who otherwise have had little opportunity to use and own books. We are attempting to find unorthodox means of making them available, such as bookshelves in community centers; parents groups connected with day care or Head Start programs; in connaction with tutorial projects, reading rooms, and study halls; and by creating or supplementing inadequate classroom or school libraries. Under the able administration of Miss Louise Cole of our staff and with the invaluable aid of the Atlanta News Agency, we are well into the process of distributing some 40,000 paperback books in these ways.

Your field department continues to serve as the secretariat for the Southern Interagency Conference, an informal gathering, four times per year, of most of the intergroup relations agencies working in the region for the purpose of discussing current problems and prospects and mutual briefing on new programs.

Service and assistance to the state councils on human relations remains, however, the primary continuing responsibility of your Department of Field Activities--and their growth in size, strength and effectiveness our constant concern.

As you know, we have been able this year, because of increased foundation support, to triple the total of our grants-in-aid to the state councils to $150,000. In addition we are now able to invest some $50,000 per year in Rural Advancement Projects under the structures of four state councils, working in close cooperation with the National Sharecroppers Fund. Moreover, the councils are able to take advantage of incidental program funds available in connection with SRC;s special projects for specific, short-term activities. Thus we are contributing between $225,000 and $250,000 to state and local council operation and program.

For the reasons mentioned by Mr. Anthony this afternoon the purpose of the expanded grant-in-aid program is to enable the state councils to grow to the point where they can be self-sustaining in their basic staffed operations. Our goal is to see this point reached by the end of 1968, with possible exceptions in the cases of the Mississippi and Louisiana Councils, which have only recently been reorganized. To this end we have constantly emphasized organized recruitment and involvement of members, organized efforts at indigenous funding, increase in size of staffs, and professional upgrading of staff--as well as concomitant development of program and services.

The response of state council leaders, both lay and professional has been gratifying and the results are notable. In addition to Rural Advancement Projects in South Carolina, Florida, Georgia and Alabama--each with a full-time director--other full-time staff professionals have been added: two in Tennessee and one each in Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama. In Louisiana an office has been opened in Baton Rouge and an able Executive Director and Office Manager employed, giving that council a staff for the first time. The operations in Arkansas, Mississippi, North Carolina, and Florida have been stabilized with adequate salaries for executives and full-time clerical employees.

While speaking of personnel changes, we note with regret that some members of the state council family who were present at this meeting last year are missing this year. Bob Alexander and Ozell Sutton resigned from the staffs of the Houston and Arkansas Councils, respectively, to accept other positions. Nat Griswold, who has been Executive Director of the Arkansas Council from its beginning, is on a six-month leave of absence to write a book and will formally retire at the end of the year. Most sadly do we report the death, on September 19, of Mr. Oliver Holmes, personable and invaluable Assistant to the Director of the Georgia Council.

As for training and upgrading of the council staffs, it has been possible to double the number of state council staff conferences. We have brought them together five times this year, in addition to their attendance at this meeting. One time it was for an eight-day Community Leadership Development Laboratory at Emory University--a first attempt to secure formal in-service training for council staffers.

The state council presidents were brought together also for a two-day conference on June 17 and 18. This, too, was the first meeting of its kind. The presidents felt that the discussion of purposes, policy and philosophy and the sharing of problems was very helpful, and they have asked that this be made an annual affair.

Time would not permit my telling you, even if I could, of all the imaginative, creative things the state councils have been doing. But let me mention a few.

The Virginia Council has made a thorough study of the ethnic bias of that state's approved textbooks and has promoted use of multi-ethnic texts by the preparation of two excellent publications on the subject, among other ways. They are also sponsoring a significant conference on religion and race, scheduled for the last of this month.

The Georgia Council has conducted and reported a well-planned study of the state's public assistance program. Jointly with the Georgia A.C.L.U. and with the aid of the SRC staff and resources, the Georgia Council prepared an attractive, easily readable handbook titled Know Your Rights, which sets forth basic rights of persons arrested by police officers. It has received wide distribution and acclaim. The North Dekalb chapter of GCHR conducted a Voter Education Project which registered about 500 persons.

The Tennessee Council has done an effective job of securing truly representative and democratic Community Action agencies in two of the largest cities in the state. Since the addition of Mr. and Mrs. Wiersema to the staff they have begun important studies of public housing and public welfare in Tennessee. Their Knoxville chapter carried out an effective Voter Registration Project.

"Project SPEED-UP" of the South Carolina Council employed college students to tutor more than 2,000 children in 28 locations in 13 counties.

The Arkansas Council secured a grant from the Voter Education Project and conducted a registration drive in 14 counties. Well over 7,000 persons were registered to vote.

The Florida Council conducted a two-day workshop for local council leaders and, partly as a result of the ideas and resources discovered to them at that meeting, the local councils of Florida have been unusually active.

The Alabama Council, utilizing a VEP grant, did an excellent job in informing farmers in 12 counties about the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service elections and of policing the elections themselves. ASCS elections are vital because the representative chosen in them determine crop allotments for the year.

The Mississippi Council has sponsored a number of statewide conferences, including one which brought together a large number of the state's impoverished people and officials of the Office of Economic Opportunity. The Executive Director has become an effective link in communication between the white establishment and Negro leaders.

The growth of the state councils is measurable statistically. We have sought this year to limit our reckoning of membership to those whose dues are currently paid. On that basis the total membership now stands at approximately 11,500, an increase of some 23% over last year. Percentage increases ranged from five percent in Virginia, which is the largest of the councils, to ninety-five percent in Arkansas, which heretofore had been one of the smallest. The Alabama Council, which won the Mitchell Award last year, increased its membership another ten percent this year. Tennessee registers a thirteen percent increase and South Carolina a jump of twenty-three percent. The North Carolina Council shows a 57% increase. And Georgia deserves special commendation of raising its membership enrollment by 53%, although starting from a relatively large base of more than a thousand members.

At the height of their strength the state councils had this year 26 full-time professional employees, an increase of 18% over last year. Part-time and clerical staffs have increased proportionately.

The councils have raised about $120,000 from their members and friends--an increase of 20%. At the same time the total of their operating budgets has passed $400,000--a leap of more than 25%.

All of these facts are encouraging.

But we cannot be satisfied with arithmetic progress when the sustained crisis of this region grows by geometric progression. The beleaguered people of the human relations councils have been these dozen years--to a greater degree than is generally understood--the salt of the South. But the conditions have been altered radically since their founding, and there are those both within and without the state councils who question the need or the possibility--or both--of their continuing. I for one am convinced that their proper role is more vital than it was in 1954 and 1955, although it needs, perhaps, to be differently conceived.

All of us are keenly aware of the radical challenge which has been thrown down by the "black power" movement and of the lightning speed of the "white backlash." Intriguing to me are the assumptions of "black power" advocates as articulated by one of their able interpreters, Mr. Julian Bond:

> ...the social system, as organized is no longer capable of solving, through normal channels, the urgent problems presented to it by history.
> ...white Americans, generally speaking, lack the will, the courage and the intelligence to voluntarily grant Negroes their civil rights and...must be forced to it by pressure.
> ...people do not discriminate for the fun of it;... the function of prejudice is to defend social, economic, political and psychological interests, and...appeals to the fair play of prejudiced people are prayers said to the wind.
> ...communities will change discriminatory patterns if they are faced with a clear-cut choice between bias and another highly developed value--economic gain, education or civic peace.

We have to ponder seriously these assumptions. We may lament the actions and strategy of those who make them. We may be grateful that no large portion of Negro Americans has been won to them. But neither the actions nor the number of those who thus believe disproves the validity of these beliefs.

Indeed, the reaction of the nation to date, far from disproving these assumptions, seems almost calculated to do the reverse. Much of the evidence brought forth in this decade of struggle for equal rights tends to confirm their suspicions. Certainly those of us who continue to discern the promise of the South's nobler customs and to dream the American dream must discern and dream by faith, for the reality is not yet.

As biracial associations of citizens committed to social change through the "normal channels" of fact-finding, education, negotiation, and enfranchisement, the human relations councils, are uniquely situated to disprove the "black power" assumptions--if indeed they can be disproven. If the human relations council idea has any genius and destiny, it lies not in leadership of the oppressed but in its potential for education of the oppressing majority. There is a movement among the oppressed. To be sure it needs and deserves all possible aid, and those who are not themselves victims can provide technical assistance as needed and called for. But the movement is there; whereas there is as yet no significant movement among the oppressing or acquiescing majority. The dissatisfaction of the minorities is or will be aroused. What is needed is an answering dissatisfaction from those who sleep in the presence of moral--and possibly mortal--peril.

One member of your SRC staff tells of trying to secure help for people who were living in unheated slum housing in the midst of a cold snap in Atlanta last winter. "We had some middle class folks down there," he said, "but the emotion they felt was pity for these poor persons. As long as that is what they feel, they can't help much--because the appropriate reaction is anger." That is true. And what we need in the human relations councils is more people--a lot more people--who have the large capacity to hold in constant, creative tension anger over the misery of the minority and pity for the insensible soul-misery of the majority.

If we are to "make democracy work" in the South we shall not do so with ten or twelve thousand people, scattered through eleven states, backing the effort with an average ten dollars each. We have to be more serious and more intense than that!

Our antagonists are more serious and more intense than that. One well-known right-wing organization which, in the judgment of some of us, is doing the most effective job of indoctrinating the white people of the South claimed, about a year ago, more than 100 "chapters" in metropolitan Birmingham alone. By conservative estimate that would mean about 1,500 members in that small area. Only yesterday the Atlanta Constitution carried the boast of one of their "staff coordinators" that an estimated 150 chapters have been organized in Georgia. They have organized over the nation "committees" to counteract the civil rights movement. In Arkansas, for example, they claim such a committee in every town of over 3,000 population. And in May they lamented in print that their contributions fell a million dollars short of their mark in 1965. They spent $5 million while contributions came to only $4,089,000--up only $889,000 from the $3,200,000 contributed in 1964!

There are many variables which must be weighed into this, of course. But the conclusion is incontrovertible that those folks mean business. And so must we!

I have always thought ( to paraphrase Abraham Lincoln ) that all men should be free; but if any should be slaves, it should be first those who permit it for themselves, and secondly those who permit it for others. I venture the opinion that we need not be anxious, in these days, about the former. I think it evident that the non-white citizens of this nation will never again resign themselves to oppression. But I am anxious indeed that white America, and the white South in particular, may continue to be permissive of oppression for others--thus to deserve it themselves.

We have therefore a message of great urgency to get across to the comfortable majority in the South. To this task I believe the human relations councils uniquely suited. It is no new idea, but an old one. It is no radical idea, but a truly conservative one. Lincoln said it:

> This is a world of compensation; and he who would be no slave must consent to have no slave. Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and under a just God, cannot long retain it.

DEPARTMENT OF FIELD ACTIVITIES
SUMMARY REPORT FOR 1966

Service and assistance to the state councils on human relations continues as the primary responsibility and concern of the Department of Field Activities. A grant of $100,000 a year for three years enabled us to increase our support of the general operations of the state councils to $150,000 in 1966, which, with $50,000 for four Rural Advancement Projects and miscellaneous grants in connection with special projects, brought our total aid to state councils to about $225,000 in the year.

We purpose, with this expanded program of aid, to enable the state councils to grow to the point of being self-sustaining in their basic operation. Substantial progress was made toward that goal. Dues-paid membership now stands at about 11,500, an increase of 23% over last year. The George Mitchell award for the greatest percentage increase in membership went to the Arkansas Council, which grew by 95%. At the height of their strength the state councils had 26 full time employees, up 18%. The councils raised about $120,000 from local sources, an increase of 20%. Their operating budgets exceeded $400,000, a jump of 25%.

Of special concern during the year has been the problem of defining the working relationship of the SRC to the state councils. In response to overtures from the state council directors and chairmen a special committee was set up to consider the problem at the annual meeting of the SRC Board in 1965. The Director of Field Activities has been working with that committee. There has been a great deal of thinking and discussion, but the committee has not yet reached the point of making concrete recommendations.

The field department was involved in several occasional projects. In the spring and early summer we cooperated with other private agencies and the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights in a series of conferences on school desegregation in each of the southern states. Under the leadership of Mrs. M. E. Tilly workshops on "Dual Justice in the Courts" were held in each state, including Kentucky.

Utilizing a grant of $25,000 from the New World Foundation, we conducted an experimental project in distribution of paperback books. More than 50,000 books were distributed to community centers, school libraries, tutorial projects, study halls in slum communities and the like. Miss Louise Cole, who joined the SRC staff early in the year, administered that program. We also had opportunity, cooperating with state councils, to help find Negro students in the eighth grade who would be apt candidates for admission to six top southern prep schools in 1967.

The field department continues to serve as the secretariat for the Southern Interagency Conference, an informal gathering, four times each year, of some forty intergroup relations agencies working in the region. We consider this a highly valuable service of the Southern Regional Council.

THE ROLE OF WHITE LIBERALS IN THE SOUTH TODAY

I am reminded of what Wilmer Dykeman Stokley said about me in Neither Black nor White. I was one of the anonymous people that she and her husband interviewed on a swing through the South. They described me as a schizophrenic sociologist who received half his education in Georgia and half at the University of Chicago. This qualifies you, I think, to be a Souhhern white liberal.

I might give a little more background on why I'm here today. One chapter in my book was the easiest to write because it had already been written. It was a paper on the role of the white liberal which I gave in 1962 at a conference sponsored jointly by the University of Houston and the Southwestern region of the Anti-Defamation League. The situation was very different from this except for a larger crowd with a more formal setting. Ted Freedman was the man who represented ADL at that conference. About three weeks ago he called me and asked if I would come back and re-evaluate what I said then.

It is no easier to talk about the white liberal now than it was in 1962. It seems to me that the first thing I would say is that the white liberal has not changed so much himself, but the ground on which he stands has shifted.

The spectrum of opinions, the spectrum of activities, the types of issues with which he is confronted have changed. His problem is made more severe by the fact that he has not kept up with this change, generally speaking, much as he has tried.

My definition of "white liberal" has not changed materially. I still see him as "the white man who has rejected segregation and the catergorical inferiority of the Negro as values." In a positive way he is committed to full equality for the Negro within American society. I would, however, make a little sharper distinction than I was able to make at that time between the white liberal and the white radical. I think this distinction is a little more evident now.

More than was true at that time, it semms to me, the white liberal differs from the radical as to how he thinks this full equality is to be achieved. Infact one of the ways in which he differs is his concern for the how of bringing about the change, as opposed to a simple faith that this full equality can be brought about and fervor for it.

Another important distinction is that the white liberal still sees this equality as being achieved within the framework of traditional American values and the traditional American political and economic structure.

To the white liberal the phrase that Charles Johnson used in his famous book, "into the main stream," still has meaning. But for many radicals--white and black--the phrase "into the main stream" has taken on a different connotation because the new cutting edge of the Negro revolution has not looked at this main stream as something that is desirable. It is a main stream which is sick and evil, the course of which must be changed. The "main stream" is something they reject now for the Negro. Their concern is not so much that the Negro must be changed, but that society be changed to fit the virtues that the Negro, including the uneducated Negro, represents and embodies in his behavior.

The second major point that I made at that time was that the social structure and normative order of American society support the inferior social status of the Negro. Now, this arouses some controversy, particularly the saying that the normative order supported the inferior social position of the Negro. I still adhere to this position. I heard a political scientist say the other day that we had not only a written constitution but an unwritten one. This was one of the things Myrdal was talking about in The American Dilemma.

We do not have a clear cut set of values which people interpret the same way and in which they agree. There is one set of very traditional values which defined this society as a white man's society. A lot of people might not be able to verbalize this and would be embarrassed to come right out and say it and act as if this were true, but when they are challenged will agree that this is the way they feel. This is reflected in history books used not only in our white schools but in our Negro schools. Negroes were taught as if this were indeed a white man's society.

At the same time, I would say that the normative order has changed significantly since 1962. It has changed in direction of greater polarization. On the one hand what Allport called official morality is even more clearly on the side of equality. In the form of legislations, in the form of judicial interpretation of what the constitution means, there is more lip service to equality, at least equality of opportunity. I gathered he is all for this. Equality of opportunity and actual equality are becomeing more and more separate things, but there also seems to be a widening of pervasive beliefs in the de facto inferiority of Negroes. We see this very interestingly reflected in the polls that Louis Harris conducts in which one of the gloomy sides of the picture is the number of white Americans who, whatever they may say they believe about the rights of Negroes, still cling to stereotype beliefs that most Negroes are dirty, smell bad, are ignorant, violent and all of these things.

At the same time there is an increasing awareness, an awareness that I don't think was present as recently as in 1962, that not just prejudice but the social structure and the accumulated effects of the behavior of people long dead hold the Negro in an inferior status. There is an awareness that we have tremendous structural problems -- problems about the way our educational system is developed, problems about the nature of our economic system, problems about the ways our juries have been selected -- which although they may not have been designed to do this, nevertheless are going to continue to add to the burdens of the Negro and make change more difficult, even if people sincerely desire to bring about this change. Now, whatever they may say in response to the attitude tests about how they personally feel that Negroes should be treated, most white Americans accept this structure as being the way things should be. They are apathetic about change. They don't envision the need for drastic change. They think American society is going to continue pretty much as it is and, if integration is going to come, the Negro is just going to become a nice middle class American who happens to have a darker skin than other people.

Now, the white liberal, who believes in full equality for the Negro must be regarded still as a deviant. In spite of official morality, in spite of official interpretation of the constitution, he still stands in opposition. His opposition is to the assumption that this is a white man's society. At the same time I feel he is less a deviant than he was in 1962 and even in 1963 in some respects. At least he is less visible as a deviant simply because more people, regardless of what their attitudes are, are externally complying with some of the forms of equality. This is particularly true in regard to desegregation of public facilities. The person who eats in a public place with a Negro doesn't stand out quite as much as he did before 1964 because there are a lot of people who have all sorts of different attitudes who are doing the same thing. He stands out only when he opens his mouth or does something else to indicate that he does this--accepts the Negroes as equals--not because somebody is compelling him to do so, but because he thinks it is the right thing to do. Then the fact that he is a deviant becomes evident.

At the same time the issues are different. New problems for the deviant are created. It seems to me that the issues on which white liberals differ now from the conservative whites are first of all, attitudes toward the problem of law and order. Secondly, the attitudes on just how drastic the racial crisis is--how much of an emergency it is. While the liberal may be concerned about law and order, he does not see it as the primary issue, whereas his conservative fellow citizens see this as an overriding issue in our domestic concerns. The liberal still views equality as the issue and sees the problems of the maintenance of law and order as symptoms of a deeper problem rather than being the problems in itself. This doesn't mean that the white liberal, particularly in contrast to some of his radical compatriots, isn't concerned about some of the tactics being used in the Negro revolution. But again he differs from the apathetic or frankly prejudiced white American in that he is quite certain that not enough is being done to meet the emergency we face.

Now let me follow up the theme that the white liberal, particularly in the South (but I don't make too much distinction between white liberals in the South and in other parts of the nation) is a deviant. I still suggest that he is not likely to be near the top of the power structure, as did in 1962. Hereagain there has been a change. Still, in southern communities, many of them, he is not likely to on the city commission or a member of whatever this vague "power elite" is. But, he does today have more access to the power structure mainly because of reorientation of the federal structure. This is not entirely an asset. It creates tremendous problems for him. In fact when you begin to get more power you begin to become more vunerable to attack. Lewis Lomax in an article about a year and a half ago, in a special issue of Ebony, described white liberals as this nation's new power elite. When you come to be regarded as part of the power elite, then you begin to get more and more of the blame for what the power elite has not done. And this is certainly happening to white liberals. At the same time even one who has access to new power who may be able to get more response from Washington when he is concerned about something, is still part of the white side of a dualist society which limits his abilities to meet the demands of the most radical Negroes for what I described as an instant utopia, that is, utopia in which full equality is achieved now. I also commented in 1962 that the Negro leaders tended to over-estimate the power of white liberals and distrust them because they did not live up to a rather inflated expectation. This I think has drastically changed. Now instead of this disappointment and slight distrust, we see more and more the notion that the white liberal is really the enemy. He is the man who has been gaining power and has not really done anything. And we see the mood expressed that since the civil rights organizer's prupose is not to lead but to get the people to lead themselves. Being white is an insurmountable handicap. After a white organizers often wonder if they are not unwittingly developing a new breed of "Uncle Toms" to put it harshly--a "Tom" who will do and think whatever the white civil rights worker wants. Even the most sensitive whites have not been able to overcome this problem and the less sensitive do not see the problem at all, glorying in the assumption that their opinions are at one with those of the local people. Now, these are all harsh words indeed--sharp rejection of white liberal as an ally of Negro militants.

Now turn to the situation which the white liberal functions. What are the effects of these changes on white liberal's role? Originally, I had designated two separate roles for the white liberals--one I called the "martyr's" role and the other the "waiting" role.

They martyr's role involves throwing self fully into the struggle, for integration--engaging in sit-ins, walking picket lines going to jails, being defamed--all the various things that could happen.

It seems to me, though, that "martyrdom" in the past few years has, in effect, been devolved. There have been so many martyrs, particular so many Negro martyrs in the movement that martyrdom is no longer as unusual end outstanding as it seems then. And the white martyr seems to me have lost a great deal of his luster. Part of this has come from the ironic factor that there seems to be more public reaction, more indignation, over white martyrs than there was over Negro martyrs. The white martyr becomes an anti-hero By his very martyrdom, he shows the hyprocrisy of society which prefers white men even in martyrdom. Furthermore, the result of the martyrdom of white liberals and white radicals has more often been official indignation at the highest levels of government than it has been evidence of remoree on the part of the opposition.

One of the hopes of the martyr is that he will heap coals of fire on his enemy's head, that by his suffering he will convert his enemy. There has been a great diminution of faith that this will really occur. There has been martyrs after martyrs after martyrs, and still we see the same sort of regime being elected in the states where these martydoms have taken place.

Furthermore, I think it's important to recognize that while different people may have different definitions, there are martyrs on both sides of the issues. This was illustrated, for example, in the Watts riot. Sometimes, as you read accounts of this, you would think that it was 34 white firemen and policemen who were killed in Watts instead of 1 white fireman and 34 Negroes. The white fireman who got trapped under a falling wall of a building which had been set on fire by rioters was a legitimate martyr. The fireman wasn't shooting anybody, wasn't even aiming his fire hose; he was trying to put out a fire and a building fell on him. His wife was let a widow--a lvery legitimate martyr. He provided an opportunity for a lot of people to point to him and forget the number of Negroes who died--although the coroner's jury said in all cases it was justifiable. This was the time of the trial of Coleman in Alabama and when my friends in Los Angeles would say do you think Coelman is going to be convicted, I would say, No. But you won't place any bets that any of the 34 deaths in Watts would be found to be homicide and not accidental. And I didn't find any takers for this. So today, white bystanders, police, public school superintendents who have almost been run out of little southern towns for achieving token integration and then find that they are under criticism by the Department of HEW for not meeting the guidelines--they are martyrs to local people including liberal friends who had worked on them for so long to get them to do what they had done and then they felt sorry for them when they were criticized. You have these martyrs on the other side. This role has lost value and is not as significant as it was in 1962.

The waiting role has also changed. Back in 1962, I was looking at the situation in terms of the conflict over desegregation. The waiting role, I saw and others saw in terms of the white liberal being a potential mediator of whom was waiting for white people of the community--the white power structure--to realize that their community had a problem and would need all the help they had in attacking it. Then they would be willing to use the white liberal because he had lines of communication with the Negro community. It worked to some extent, Many Negro leaders who in 1961-1962 were placing all of their emphasis on the attack of what I call symbolic segregation are saying we were attacking the wrong things. It was noble; it was important, but the real basic things were jobs and housing.

Many people--Stokely Carmichael one of them--are saying what, if said in 1962, whould have made one sound like a conservative: "What good is it to desegregate a lunch counter if a man doesn't have enough money to buy a hamburger?" This is how much the situation has changed. Carmichael can say that. Nobody accuses him of being an Uncle Tom for saying it. In 1962, if the white person had said that, immediately people would say, "Are you really a segregationist? Until we get rid of segregation, we're not going to be able to attack these other problems."

Well, I don't think that in most cases the white liberal has to wait for people to know that they have a problem. Most conservatives are well aware that every American community is involved in the racial crisis. Even with scarcely any Negro population at all, they never know when the government might decide to put a Job Corps center outside their community. It may be in North Dakota, and suddenly they decide that the social structure of their community just wouldn't take it. The thing is brought home to them very strongly.

The white liberal no longer has much of a role as a negotiator or mediator because it has been brought home forcefully to the conservative power structure that the people they have to talk to are the militant Negroes. They might just as well talk to them directly. If in 1962 the white liberal had difficulty being accepted as a mediator by the white community, he has even more difficulty being accepted by civil rights leaders as a spokesman for them. What then can he wait for? If he doesn't choose to become a part of the Negro revolution, he must choose the role, in effect, of preventing the revolution from continuing at a run away pace and/or another role of waiting to help heal the wounds of what I regard as an inevitable conflict. I think we are in for a lot more conflict--a lot more violent conflict--and I think that in a few years, people like ourselves--who do still have some friendships across racial lines--are going to be a rare and precious commodity in this society.

Now let's talk about this first thing of doing what he can to prevent the revolution from exploding. This, I look at in terms of the issues which I have said have changed. It seems to me that symbolic desegregation is no longer the dominant issue. This is very clear in the utterances of the cutting edge of the civil rights movement. Sometimes, the most militant Negro leader sounds almost like a segregationist. While they qualify and say that it's white people that are racist, very often the words are almost identical with those used ten years ago by white segregationists. There is a more clearly revealed race consciousness amoung Negroes than there was when there was so much faith in the possibility and the value of integration per se. The dominant issue is basic inequality--inequality in housing--for example--which can and does involve segregation, of course, but exists anyway, leaving aside the issue of segregation. A bad house is bad no matter what kind of neighborhood it's in and a good house is a better house than a bad one even in a segregated housing project. There is basic inequality in power of all kinds, although this gap is being closed somewhat.

It seems to me that the task that the white liberal, if he does not choose to be essentially a subservient ally of whatever the black power approach is, has tasks which are very difficult and discouraging. This is nothing new to him; he has always had difficult and discouraging and seemingly fruitless tasks. First of all, where there is indeed something that resembles a white liberal power elite in community, in a state or the extent that we find this in the federal government, the white liberal may have an opportunity to be a strategist or an executor of strategy in developing programs or helping carry them out. I use the term programs deliberately because to me you might contrast the liberal and the radical in that the liberal is more programmatic. He views the solution of this, like other social problems, more in terms of social engineering than he does in terms of a revolutionary drive in pursuit of slogans. I think this is a major thing in distinguishing aim from the real radical. The radical doesn't ask so much how is this work going to work out, or is it feasible; he just has faith that if you act as if it's feasible, it's going to be accomplished.

Now briefly, I am going to mention some of the things in which I am sure many of you are involved. One is problem, the whole task, of providing employment opportunities and training to meet these employment opportunities for Negroes and for members of other groups who need them. One of the most optimistic men that I have talked to in the past few months was an Urban League secretary from a western state who was just "bobbing" with enthusiasm about what he felt he was accomplishing in his state. He knew that for a good many people in that state he was doing something. If we have faith that we can come through this crisis without, ineeffect, destroying and rebuilding American society in a wasteful way, we have to have faith that these programs, little as they may seem, have some value, and it is better to do them even though they don't seem to accomplish the whole job, than to leave them undone. The only real justification for leaving them undone is to say that the only thing to do is to make the situation worse. If you want consciously to do that, then we shouldn't engage in employment and training enterprises, in educational projects such as tutorial programs, headstart programs, in voter education, registration programs, or in various difficult tasks. I don't know how much we have this in the South, but I have been talking to a man who has been involved in Miami of not just trying to get neighborhoods desegregated, but trying to keep neighborhoods stable now that they have gotten desegregated. We are losing ground more rapidly than we make it. As we get desegregation in a few more neighborhoods, they go thorugh a brief period of being integrated neighborhood, t then before long they are all black again. Now looking at the situation realistically these may be simply ameliorative or palliative programs, as many of their opponents would say. We can look at them with faith that in the long run they are going to add up to bringing about some of the changes we need in society without having a violent revolution. Or they may be regarded as simply insincere attempts to forestall the inevitable showdown and to try to take the sting out of the drive of the most militant Negro leaders.

An even less rewarding task for the white liberal is one of attempting to influence other white people--in effect turning back to the white society of which he is still a part inspite of what he might like to be. I have a feeling that this is one task that we have too often neglected, of trying to find some common ground of communication with those white people who, because of their racial attitudes, we often abhor, but who nevertheless represent a lot more people than we represent. Negroes and white liberals still need allies, unless there is a real possibility of achievement of black power, or the third world war is coming or whatever other unpredictable outcome there may be. It seems to me that if there is to be any hope of getting significant support--particularly political support--from white people who are not liberals, it might be on the basis of persuading these white people to see that they do have some interest in common with Negroes.

I'll give just a couple of examples. One of these I've seen in an AFL-CIO workshop which I participated a couple of years ago. I was trying to point out to white people that the employment problems of the Negro today are going to be the problems, in just a few years, of a large proportion of the whites. Now I know a lot of the economists say that automation is going to make more jobs than it does away with, as they always say. This is a small consolation for the guy who is out of work while he is waiting for the new jobs to appear. Perhaps they don't appear in his life time. Here is a basically non-racial issue that people who are concerned about racial issues are facing more strongly today than a lot of people who should be concerned about this issue but are n not, partly because it is very often defined for them in racial terms. I'd like to see local councils on human relations have programs which say nothing primarily about race but discuss various standpoints, the new question which you are hearing more and more about: the guaranteed wage. Discuss it from a stanpoint of Milton Freedman as well as from the standpoint of liberal economy. I think you might get more people interested in this common problem.

Another one of my pet topics is the problem of police practices. But I don't think it takes much insight to recognize that one of the reasons for the existing problems is that occupationally police themselves are a minority group. Not nearly as many tears are shed over thelong working hours and the low pay of the average policeman as there are of those of the average school teacher. If I had to make my choice, I'd rather see the policeman upgraded than the school teacher, because if he is a bad policeman I know what the consequences are. It is a little more difficult to tell who is really the good teacher and who is the bad teacher. When that policeman gets that gun out, there is no question what the consequences are. They are immediate. I would like to see white liberal groups make the effort to convince the police that they are notjust againt them, but that they are also for them because they regard them as a crucial element of our society who need not only criticism but also very important support.

Finally, as I said I seemuch more conflict as being inevitable regardless of what we can do. I haven't really finished thinking through the possible outcomes of this.. Maybe, as some people argue, only out of conflict will white people come to have real respect for Negroes. I hope it wouldn't take as long to begin to rehabilitate people's attitudes to Negroes as it did to rehabilitate attitudes toward the Indians. We see now, of course, that the red man is noble because he fought so well, as well as being faithful. Geronimo gets good treatment as well as Tanto.

As little as it may seem in view of the forthcoming conflict, I think that preserving this claim of friendship across interracial lines is important. Much as we may criticize the mutual admiration of societies of white liberals and moderate Negroes, these friendships may some day prove to be precious commodities. In a society which is more badly divided than it is today, people who have maintained these friendships may be the ones who are able to begin to rebuild a new and fuller sense of citizenship and fellow humanity.

SUBJECT: Committee to Study the Relationship between SRC and the State Councils--Meeting on September 27, 1966

The Committee to Study the Relationship between SRC and the State Councils met in the SRC conference room on September 27, 1966. Those attending were Joe Hendricks, Franklin Williams (Florida), and The Reverend Hubert Beckwith, in addition to John Pecoul and I of the SRC staff.

To place our discussion in context, I read the statement which had been drafted by the state council directors and presented to the Executive Committee of SRC on June 3, 1965, and the action taken by the Executive Committee, including setting up the present special committee. (See attached copies.) Hendricks and Williams mentioned the meeting of state council presidents which was held in June of this year, said that some of the concerns expressed at that meeting were also pertinent to our subject, and expressed agreement that every effort must be made to put the state councils on a self-sustaining basis for their minimal general operations. Someone commented to the effect that the children should not only be weaned, but also should be set up as full partners.

The committee then proceeded to list the following objectives which they felt the relationship, whatever it might be, should be designed to pursue:

(1) A regional identity for the state councils and their memberships.

(2) A sizeable and representative membership body for both the state councils and SRC.

(3) Expanded and refined programs for the state councils; more technical skills on the state council staffs and available to them.

(4) Coordination of programs within SRC and between SRC and the state councils. This would mean better communication, but also consultation on program planning. The comment was made, "Something is being said in the fact that the SRC program money for state and local councils is not being gobbled up."

(5) Representation and participation for membership, including training for members to enable them to participate effectively.

Several ideas about specific steps toward these objectives were discussed. The principal ones were an expanded field department at SRC, a department of development, and a more integral relationship between SRC and the councils on human relations.

The committee felt that the Department of Field Activities needs to be greatly expanded, whether or not the formal relationship of the organizations changes. It should include a staff of specialists in the needs of state and local councils. (I took this to mean, for example, a specialist to help local councils organize and sustain affiliated student organizations; or someone who could stay for an extended period in a city to organize a fair housing effort; etc.) The committee mentioned the need for an advisory group for the field department.

In connection with field activities, the committee was concerned about the problem suggested in point four above, i.e., that there are many programs in the field not coordinated with "field activities." It was observed that the state councils were originally conceived as the agents for SRC's field activities; that the rapid growth and strength presupposed by this conception had not proven possible; and that, consequently, they are now--in effect--one of several SRC projects, all of which are field activities. It was felt that the state councils need more expert attention to enable them to attain strength to handle such needs as SRC must deal with, at present, through the special project apparatuses, although they are properly the concern of the state councils as well as SRC.

On the subject of mutual fund-raising, the committee felt the need for something like a "department of development" within SRC. It was stressed that they were not talking about a professional fund-raiser, but rather the need for one or more individuals, committed to the over-all purpose of SRC, who would develop programs as well as support for them and for the agency's general operations. "A department of development," someone summed up, "which is an integral part of the program--not a fund raiser."

A considerable amount of time was devoted to the need for a more integral relationship between SRC and the state councils, in order to achieve the objectives outlined above. One possibility would be to have each state council elect one SRC Board member each year, which would mean an eventual total of 40 out of the 100 Board members. Someone recalled a phrase Les Dunbar often used, "the SRC-human relations council movement." The committee felt that if there is indeed a movement, it needs to be structured and given leadership. They felt that the times and circumstances call for "a movement that is large, public, and regional." "In some way SRC ought to be connected with a membership--a large constituency."

The committee felt that their discussion tended to point up the interpretation that SRC has gone through constant evolution as re-evaluation and restructuring was required by circumstances. They felt that they were not really suggesting a new departure, but only a return--or partial return--to the original concept. They asked me to describe their deliberations and wanted to have placed in the context of them a set of propositions drafted by H. Franklin Williams and unanimously agreed upon:

SRC and the councils on human relations should share a regional identity.

Representative membership of active people is needed for the ends of both SRC and the state councils.

Members of the councils on human relations must feel that they participate in SRC.

SRC should regard the maintenance and extension of council on human relations membership as one of its objectives.

To this end its field service should be built up with an eye to offering training and professional advice to the staffs of the councils and to suggesting projects which involve members in active and significant participation.

There should be no interruption in other projects of SRC, but a real effort to keep the councils on human relations informed about them and involved, where possible.

The committee agreed that these propositions were not to be construed as conclusions to be proposed to the SRC Executive Committee, but rather to be submitted to the Executive Director for his response and comment. They asked that these comments be communicated to the special committee members. If it seems advisable, they will meet before or during the annual meeting to draft definite proposals.

TO: The Special Committee to Study the Relationship between SRC and the State Councils

FROM: Paul Anthony

Ed Stanfield has shared with me the report on your meeting of September 27. I regret that I was unable to attend at least a portion of that meeting. We do appreciate the time you have devoted to this matter and hope that we can ask you to continue serving on this important committee. I particularly appreciate your decision to submit your recommendations to me to give us an opportunity for continued discussion and comment. I think this is a very sound approach to these deliberations and that we can hope for the greatest amount of progress at this point by following such a plan.

At the outset, let me assure you (although I hope it isn't necessary) that I have a deep commitment to the existence of the state councils and their growth. This is commitment which is shared without question by the Executive Committee and staff of SRC. I am certain that SRC can perform a valuable and essential service to the state councils through its regional operation. This ranges from services to the state councils and providing programs and specialists to continued regional and national fund raising efforts on behalf of the state councils. In turn, I feel it is essential for the operation of SRC to have this outreach into the whole region, this structure, this identity with and information from the "grass-roots." It would be the most serious mistake, in my opinion, if we did not continue the closest possible partnership, insofar as we at the Southern Regional Council are concerned. We would hope the members of the Special Committee would always consider their worth in the context of not whether or not there should be a continued close relationship but on how the partnership can be most effectively continued. Your recommendations reflect that we are of the same mind on this.

Specific comments on your recommendations follow:

1. SRC and the councils on human relationships should share a regional identity.

I quite agree with this. To a substantial measure this is already the case, but I think it is something we should be positively aware of and work toward increasing. As a part of this recommendation, I think more thought has to be given to an idea which the state council directors have discussed for several years. This is the possibility of the state councils forming at least a more formal confederation which can on occasion speak as one voice or plan special programs for the entire region. The leadership of several of the state councils have expressed considerable enthusiasm for this idea. The leadership of several other councils have expressed some reservation about the extent to which this removes policy and program planning from the policy leadership to the state councils' staff. Since there is some remaining question about this, I think the committee should give thought to it and request that state council presidents and directors continue to think about it, preferably when they meet together. Incidentally, as a part of this regional identity I believe that the councils on human relations should consider themselves in a position to have a constant and strong voice in the planning of future SRC programs and projects. To a reasonable degree, we here consider this now the case but I think there is room for more emphasis on this. Certainly, we will be very responsive to the requests for needs, services, programs and direction from the state council leadership.

2. Representative membership of active people is needed for the ends of both SRC and the state councils.

Here again we are in complete agreement. Several years ago the members of SRC at an annual meeting voted that one of the considerations to be taken into account on the election of new members was the involvement of the persons under consideration in the council on human relations from their state. This policy has been followed regularly and each year. A majority of those persons nominated have been actively involved in the state council. This consideration will continue to be a part of the deliberations of future members of future nominating committees. It is unlikely at this point that the Executive Committee of SRC would look with favor on any proposal that would automatically give to the state councils the election of a certain number of SRC members. This procedure was deliberately abandoned in 1957 when the councils became autonomous, and at this time the Executive Committee strongly supports the concept of autonomy.

3. Members of the Councils on Human Relations must feel that they participate in SRC.

4. SRC should regard the maintenance and extension of Council on Human Relations Membership as one of its objectives.

Again we are in complete agreement. For the past several years we have attempted to emphasize this and, for instance, toward that end the George Mitchell Award was instituted. (Incidentally this award with a cash value of $1,000 a year is a pretty heavy burden on SRC, but was deliberately chosen in that amount to be a real inducement.) In the future, I would like to see us give particular emphasis to suggestions, program assistance and financial resources, which will help to maintain membership and the involvement of Council members in the programs of the several state councils.

5. To this end its field services should be built with the idea of offering trained and professional advice to the staffs of the councils and in suggesting projects which involve members in active and significant participation.

Again we are in complete agreement. There is quite frankly a limit to which we can expand the field services but certainly they are inadequate at this time. I feel that Ed Stanfield is doing a remarkable job as Field Director and particularly in assisting the state councils. Quite obviously this is a job which one man, no matter how good, cannot adequately fill.

6. There should be no interruption of the projects of SRC, but a real effort to keep the councils on human relations informed about them and involved where possible.

All of the statements made heretofore in this memorandum refer to this. They do, of course, reflect complete agreement with you again. We have not done as good a job as possible in keeping the state councils informed about SRC projects and a real effort is underway here to improve that. Beyond that I would place more emphasis perhaps than this Committee has on the matter of involving state and local councils in SRC projects. It would be my hope that with rare exception there would be considerable involvement in SRC projects on the part of state and local councils and as mentioned before, indeed, substantial planning in them before they are initiated.

Beyond the above response to your several recommendations it might be good if you knew more of some of our thinking here as we go through what is in effect a period of significant transition for the Southern Regional Council. In the past year we have grown tremendously. (Incidentally, for the first time the rate of growth of our financial assistance to the state councils has been proportionate to the remainder of our growth.) While that opinion might well change because of the changing conditions, it is my strong opinion at this point that we have reached the "saturation point." I believe for a substantial further growth on the part of the Southern Regional Council in terms of number of staff, number of projects, or of money available would be very questionable. We are not here interested in building an empire and the relatively modest staff and budget in comparison with the results gained over the past fifteen years gives me considerable pause before we undertake any additional substantial expansion. Quite frankly, I would hope the trend is in the other direction. That to a gentle and gradual degree we begin to slowly cut back to a point where we are perhaps twenty percent smaller in staff and budget than we are at this time. You should know that in part I reached this opinion because in oversize fashion we share a particular problem with the state councils. Namely, we have great difficulty in finding adequate support for our general operations and we, like the state councils, must give this first priority and must be concerned that at no time do we over-extend ourselves.

Further, we here at SRC are not anxious to become over-extended in field programs. There are certain functions such as our Voter Education Project which we have no choice but to undertake. These are, however, specific functions for a limited amount of time and they are not seen as a permanent part of the agency. In general, we feel state councils particularly, but other agencies as well, are in a far better position to undertake program work on the local level. Our unique function is on an entirely different level and I believe it would be a mistake not to recognize that uniqueness and the danger of considerable duplication if we become too involved in programs.

I hope it will be possible for this Committee to meet before or during the Annual Meeting and should you wish there will certainly be an opportunity for the Committee to report to the members of the Council on your thinking and deliberation at this point.

The Council now has a number of special committees at work on future SRC policies and programs. I am certain I speak for the full Council in expressing the opinion that this Committee is one of the most important. This will be dicussed with the Executive Committee of SRC. I personally hope this Committee will continue to function indefinitely and that each of you will continue to be agreeable to serve.

We look forward to seeing you on November 16.

Some Annotations on Negro Voter Registration Figures

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| ALABAMA | -- | This estimate includes some 22,000 listed by federal examiners and put on the rolls by an 11/23/65 3-man federal court decision. |
| ARKANSAS | -- | Negro registration probably declined in the state, 12/64 to 12/65. Knowledgeable local persons are in agreement and the official total registered figure is lower than it was a year ago. Estimate. |
| FLORIDA | -- | Officially recognized as a decline over 12/64. Lists have been officially purged. Official. |
| GEORGIA | -- | Registration has increased only slightly and has not been fully documented. Estimate. |
| LOUISIANA | -- | Does not include 10,926 listed by federal examiners as of 10/25. Official. |
| MISSISSIPPI | -- | While an estimate this figure has been attributed to local state officials although official registration data has not been announced. It does not include an additional 22,934 listed by federal examiners as of 11/27/65. |
| NORTH CAROLINA | -- | Estimate. |
| SOUTH CAROLINA | -- | Released official figures for the first time in 6/65; 142,780 is a slight decline over SRC estimates for a year ago. (While an estimate, SRC had its most precise reporting from this state.) Does not include 3,100 listed by federal examiners as of 11/28/65. |
| TENNESSEE | -- | Very low estimate. State has had an increase but we had not documented it. |
| TEXAS | -- | Probably has had little change. Also not documented. Estimate. |
| VIRGINIA | -- | This is low estimate. Official data is anticipated, 12/65. |

The total we talk of is roughly 2.3 million. This is a 6.09% increase over the SRC total for one year ago. If the number listed by federal examiners in three states were added to the 1965 total the increase over 1964 as of approximately 11/65 would be approximately 7.79%.

SNCC: Rebels With A Cause

Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is a spearhead of Southern Freedom Movement

BY LERONE BENNETT JR.

WHEN, in calmer times, men come to write the history of our raucous era; when they seek the cry that called a New Left, the rasp that twitched the nerves of Negro youths and the image that convulsed American campuses; when they try to set down in words once and for all the forces that pushed America to a desperate confrontation with herself, it seems likely that they will devote a considerable amount of attention to the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee which has emerged within the last year as a major force of the Freedom movement, to the dismay of many persons of power—not all of them white.

A product of the sit-in movement which it, in part, led and a major force of the New Left which it inspired and, in part, leads, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee—abbreviated SNCC and pronounced SNICK—is the most radical, the most controversial and perhaps the most creative of all civil rights organizations. Strictly speaking, however, SNCC is neither an organization nor a civil rights movement. An organization in revolt against organization, a formless form, SNCC is a revolutionary action agency dedicated to the proposition that racism is only one symptom of a deeper sickness at the heart of our society. By establishing toeholds deep in Black Belt hells and by carrying the revolution from door to door (see pictures this page) in a unique in-depth approach to community organization, SNCC has raised fundamental questions not only about Negro rights but also and perhaps more significantly about the meaning of leadership, education, and democracy in American life. Raising these questions in and through action, SNCC has created a radical, non-compromising climate which has exerted continuing pressure on civil rights organizations.

Canvassing for potential voters in Hattiesburg, Miss., Johnny Waters (l.) tries to persuade a skeptical prospect (above) that voting is key to power and freedom.

Tough, abrasive, and avowedly revolutionary (in a nonviolent way), SNCC has played a large and unheralded role in a quasi-revolution it wants to make "a real revolution." SNCC was primarily responsible for raising the whole issue of "One Man, One Vote" in Black Belt areas of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. It also helped to create scaffolds of revolt in Selma, Albany (Ga.) and other focal points of the struggle. Beyond all that, SNCC has infused new life into the Freedom movement by creating new forms (the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, statewide Negro student organizations, sharecroppers unions, Freedom schools). No other civil rights group has been so endlessly inventive in local organization; nor has any other group grown so fast. From a nucleus of sixteen ex-students in 1961, SNCC has grown into a direct-action giant with a budget of almost $1 million and the largest field staff of any civil rights organization. From SNCC headquarters on the edge of downtown Atlanta, the organization's Secretariat (Chairman John Lewis, Program Secretary Cleveland Sellers, Executive Secretary James Forman) directs a staff of 200 organizers, most of them Negroes, most of them Southern-born, almost all of them former college and high school students who have adopted rebellion as a profession. Agitators for equality, SNCC practices equality. All members of the staff are members of the policy-making Coordinating Committee which elects the executive staff and executive committee.

Thinking the idea through, weighing the dangers, prospect scratches his head. Waters redoubles his efforts, points to the need for self-assertion on part of Negroes.

Though structured, SNCC is more a secular religious order than an organization. On entering the group, one resigns, in a manner of speaking, from society; and almost everything SNCC people do or say is designed to reinforce or reflect a willed distance from a society almost all SNCC people consider rotten to its very core. SNCC staffers want to transform American society. They are critical of the acts and values of the middle class—Negro and white. Detached from a society which they reject, living on subsistence wages of $20 a week, scorning the ties of family and conventionality which stay the arm of the adjusted, SNCC workers are full-time rebels with a flaming cause.

Who are these rebels?

What do they want?

How do they intend to get it?

The SNCC rebels, to take the first question first, are intense, nervous people who know the insides of many jails, people who have seen the bottomless cruelty of man, people who have seen their best friends beaten to pulp and killed, people who have been tested, who have looked on death and despair a long, lonely time. Most are veterans of the sit-ins and freedom rides which stirred them greatly. The sit-ins, Charlie Cobb says, marked "the first time I had ever seen any black people doing anything that was not controlled by white people." Cobb, like most of his colleagues, is also in flight from a middle-class America he considers hopelessly corrupt. Cleve Sellers spoke for almost all of SNCC staffers when he explained why he abandoned Howard University and a potential career as a mechanical engineer. "I couldn't make it in that society. I couldn't breathe."

What sustains these rebels is a mystique of total commitment. SNCC workers take vows of total poverty and total devotion. They identify themselves totally with the people—i.e., the poor, the despised, the downtrodden, the humiliated. Sharecroppers with eyes, victims with voices, they thrust themselves into the ditches of desperation so they can speak more clearly for the inhabitants thereof. SNCC workers dress poor, think poor and act poor. Most of them wear the rough overalls and large working shoes of Negro farmers and laborers. "Basically," James Forman has said, "we're dealing with poor people, and these are the people we identify with. It even affects our salary scale. One reason it's so low is just lack of money, but another reason is that we think you can't come out from a nice hotel every day to work with these people and then go back at night. Besides, in Mississippi, as a practical matter, you have to look like a rural Negro in order to get to talk to a rural Negro. And then we have to move a lot, and there's no use wearing a coat and tie if you're likely to end up sleeping on the floor. Another thing that's operating here, too, consciously or unconsciously, is: Why should we have to comb our hair and put on a coat and tie to get what are basically our rights? The student (sit-in) movement was positive, and without it we couldn't have had this, but it was also defensive—to show people we were clean. This is a different game. Also, there's a certain mystique about the dress, a certain morale factor. Maybe we've overdone it; it's almost a uniform now."

Another element in the SNCC mystique is a deep, almost religious, faith in the ability of people to govern themselves. "The people," Prathia Hall says, "are also our teachers. People who have struggled to support themselves and large families, people who have survived in Georgia and Alabama and Mississippi, have learned some things we need to know. There is a fantastic poetry in the lives of the people who have survived with strength and nobility. I am convinced of how desperately America needs the blood transfusion that comes from the Delta of Mississippi."

In the SNCC view, it is evil for a leader to manipulate people and tell them what to do. What is required, they believe, is "a waiting for the motion of the people, a working with them to the point where they can develop a program." Bob Parris, the philosopher-poet of the people concept, has said: "What we have begun to learn and are trying to explore about people is how they can come together in groups, small groups or large groups, and talk to each other and make decisions about basic things, about their lives. . . . Our problem with people who might want to do this . . . is that they would first think that in order to go to people and get them together, they would have to have something for them to talk about. So they would have to have a program to carry to them or they would have to have something to organize them around. But it doesn't turn out to be true, from our experience. You could in the North, in the ghettos, get together 10 or 20 people and out of their getting together and giving them a chance to talk about their main problem would come programs that they themselves decided on, that they thought about. If that happened and began to happen around the country, that would be the key to spreading some of the things that have happened in the South to the rest of the country."

SNCC's philosophy of leadership is grounded on its deep faith in people. SNCC believes that leadership is specific to the situation and that one does not have to be articulate, college-educated, or clean in order to exercise it. "We believe," John Lewis says, "that the leader is one who should emerge from particular situations and problems. SNCC people say the press creates leaders in America. These leaders have to have certain characteristics. They have to be articulate, college educated. Then you are a leader, as long as you keep in line. But SNCC people are saying that even the people in Mississippi must emerge as leaders. They must be able to speak for themselves."

This is not, it should be noted, an intellectual pose. Bob Moses, who became famous as leader of the Mississippi Project, left the state and changed his name (to Parris) because too many people knew his name. "My position there," he said, "was too strong, too central, so that people who did not need to, began to lean on me, to use me as a crutch."

SNCC's position on leadership is a direct criticism of the entire civil rights movement. "We are in revolt," John Lewis says, "not only against segregation but also against the type of leadership, the so-called old guard leadership, where you have had a select few to speak for the Negro people and to make deals. No one person can be picked, no one organization can be picked to speak for the Negro people. People must be allowed to speak and decide for themselves. Even the civil rights movement must become democratic."

Absorbing violence, SNCC leader John Lewis falls to ground after attack by state troopers who stopped first attempt to march from Selma to Montgomery. SNCC made first large-scale penetrations of Albany, Georgia, and Selma. Organization also played large role in focusing attention on conditions in Black Belt enclaves in the South.

Leaders with contempt for leadership, organizers who despise imposed organization, heroes with contempt for heroism, SNCC staffers find it necessary to spend a great deal of time disputing the view that they are the James Bonds of the civil rights movement. Bob Parris has said that the SNCC staffers are "very afraid of the people in the South and that they have had to fight and struggle against [it]." He added: "But suppose, then, that they had no choice, that is they can, through many different ways, see that their backs, so to speak, were against the wall and they had to move within that fear. And then suppose that what they are trying to do is explore how to move within the boundaries of fear and that what they've got to learn about fear is that it paralyses you so that you don't move—you don't do what you think you should, be it to ask a question or take a person to register. And suppose also about the Mississippi people that they're not heroes and that we're not heroes, that we're trying very hard to be people and that is very hard. If anything what we're trying to do, or have to do, is to see how you can move even though you are afraid."

Making few compromises with themselves, SNCC staffers refuse to accept compromises from others. This has led to no end of hard feeling within the civil rights movement where SNCC has repeatedly denounced the "realistic" policies of allies.

SNCC refuses to play the game. It has consistently condemned gestures and conciliations. It was cool toward the March on Washington and largely hostile to the Selma-to-Montgomery march, both of which it considered gestures largely without context and content.

The intransigence of SNCC staffers stems not only from the pains they have suffered but also from their peculiar vantage point. Having made themselves into sharecroppers and laborers, viewing life from that vantage point, SNCC staffers believe, with Jean-Paul Sartre, that truth is the perspective of the truly disinherited. "When a man has risked his life to vote," Prathia Hall says, "you can't offer him anything less than what he needs and be relevant."

In the rhetoric of Negro leadership, it is permissible to ask for the whole cake with the understanding that the white man will give only a slice, if that. But when SNCC asks for the whole cake, SNCC wants the whole cake and is prepared to create nonviolent havoc to get it.

What distinguishes SNCC from other civil rights organizations is its tough, power-oriented, wholistic approach. The moral issue, it believes, cannot be realistically separated from the political and economic issues. Nor, it believes, can Selma be divorced from Saigon or Santo Domingo. More and more, in recent months, SNCC has taken the lead in denouncing American foreign policy in Africa, Asia, and Latin America.

At the same time, there has been a shift in SNCC's position on nonviolence. SNCC still champions nonviolence as an offensive tactic, but few SNCC staffers believe that getting themselves clobbered on the head will change either George Wallace's policies or his morals. "Since the founding of SNCC," Lewis says, "there has been a great deal of debate on nonviolence. The discussion now is perhaps at its highest peak. The majority of staff people accept nonviolence as a tactic and technique. That's all we require of people."

SNCC's objective is a fundamental change in the social, economic, and political structures of America. How does it propose to achieve this objective? By creating "pockets of power" outside established institutions, by organizing and stimulating local or indigenous movements, by going to the people and sharing their agony and their danger and their hope. "Our job," Lewis says, "is to help educate, help prepare people for political action. Our job is to organize the unorganized into a vital force for radical, social, economic, and political change. Our job is to create what I like to call pockets of power and influence, where the people can say, 'This is what I want and need.'"

In pursuit of its objectives, SNCC sends workers (field secretaries) into backwoods areas to live with the people and to show them a new way of living and a new way of resisting. Field secretaries live wherever they can find a bed. They share the food, the dangers, and the privations of the people. Talking to the people in poolrooms, in kitchens, in cotton fields, in bars, they win their confidence and begin the slow and painful process of developing "indigenous" leadership. Day after day, they knock on doors and urge Negroes in Black Belt counties to assert themselves, to organize, register, and vote. Many doors, in the beginning, are slammed in their faces. But the SNCC field secretaries keep coming back, and a man here or a woman there throws caution to the wind and invites them in. Slowly, painfully, dangerously, SNCC workers sow the seeds of assertion and humanity, giving men, women, and little children the courage to defy sheriffs, nightriders, and the organized power of the state.

Spreading love, SNCC workers conduct Freedom School in yard of Mississippi home. SNCC, which grew out of sit-in movement, attracted national attention with organization, in 1964, of Mississippi Summer Project and Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party. More political than most civil rights groups, SNCC organizes communities "in depth."

Deep in the America nobody wants to see, SNCC staffers have learned a great deal about themselves and about others. The organization's whole program, in fact, is a reflection of experiences paid for by blood and pain since the sit-in movement. Organized in October, 1960, at a conference of sit-in students on the campus of Atlanta University, SNCC concentrated in the beginning on lunch counter desegregation. "But we soon discovered," Prathia Hall says, "that that was not where it was at. Then we went into the Black Belt with voter registration. The people there couldn't eat at lunch counters because they were only making twenty-three cents an hour. That was where it was at." Starting with a Bob Parris-inspired project in Mississippi in 1961, SNCC shifted its emphasis from hamburgers to political power, using voter registration as a tool to reorganize communities and re-structure them around new axes. In out-of-the-way places, without trumpets, the original sixteen clawed toeholds and hung on. They went from one filthy jail to another, from one shack to another—and as they moved, singing, their numbers grew. By 1962, there were some 150 dedicated field secretaries.

The longer SNCC struggled, the more it learned, and the more attention it attracted. But it suffered from inadequate public relations (a term SNCC staffers loathe, preferring the omnibus "communications") and the tendency of white reporters to lump the organization with King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference. SNCC acquired high visibility for the first time in the summer of 1964 with the organization of the Freedom Democratic Party (FDP) which challenged the bona fides of the lily-white Democratic Party in a melee that almost stopped the Democratic convention. The Atlantic City confrontation was, in some respects, a turning point for SNCC which has always distrusted people who wear ties and eat three large meals a day. ("If you're comfortable," SNCC staffers say, "you're out of it.") When national civil rights leaders suggested that FDP accept a compromise of two-at-large seats, SNCC exploded. Its anger has not yet died down. "All these people," John Lewis said, "said they were supporting us, but at the eleventh hour they said they could go no further. It was an eye-opener, a sign of the men standing up and the boys sitting down." Prathia Hall adds: "(Atlantic City) indicated to some of us that you cannot get too close to the power structure and expect to change it. So that's why some of us are guarding against being absorbed by the Establishment. We want to be outside the Establishment. We speak from that vantage point."

Operating outside the Establishment, on the uncharted frontiers of power, SNCC has moved to the forefront of the Freedom movement. Mississippi, which is criss-crossed today with a beehive of indigenous political and economic movements, is a tangible testimonial to the group's community organization concept. SNCC workers are now fanning out over Arkansas, Alabama, and Georgia, in a series of Black Belt projects modeled loosely on the successful Mississippi Project. The organization is also making experimental probes in urban centers. Bob Parris is developing an urban project in Alabama. Even more important perhaps is SNCC's first foray into the North with the organization of a community center in Chicago.

Program Secretary Cleveland Sellers says SNCC will continue to stress political and economic issues and the development of local leadership. SNCC will also press, he says, the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party's challenge to the lily-white Mississippi Democratic Party.

SNCC's vision for the future transcends voter registration. What the organization is trying to do is to create new communities and new men. "What we are trying to do," Sellers says, "is to make people important and necessary again." Sellers adds: "The idea of SNCC will always be with us. SNCC is a moving force in this country, a force that has only people and the interests of people at heart. We're raising basic questions about our society. We're trying to get people to see that when you talk about civil rights you have to go deeper than hamburgers, deeper maybe than even the vote. You have to go really deep into the whole thing about relationships. That's what makes SNCC unique. I don't think any other organization wants to deal with these basic things. I think we have to go even further, however, to be most unique. We're trying to find ways now so we can deal with man as man, because he is who he is, and not in terms of money or his father's background."

Although SNCC has fashioned a formidable instrument, it is far from perfect. As Howard Zinn pointed out in the excellent book, SNCC: The New Abolitionists, SNCC is not "scrupulously well-organized; letters may go unanswered, phone calls go unreturned, meetings start late or never or without agendas. It is so quick to act that it often does not stop and plan actions carefully to get the most value from them. It does not take enough time to work out long-range strategy. It is not groomed in the niceties of public relations. . . . It exasperates its friends almost as often as it harrasses its enemies." It should be noted, however, that a great deal of this disorganization is organized. SNCC staffers tend to see structure and organization as hypocrisy and they are determined to defy the iron law of organization which says that the more an organization wins the more conservative and bureaucratized it becomes.

Will success spoil SNCC?

This question is discussed often nowadays by SNCC staffers who are grappling with two major problems—one internal, the other external—stemming largely from the organization's success. The internal problem revolves around the relations between Negro staff members and the large number of whites who gravitated to the organization after the successful Mississippi strike. Some whites with special skills have drifted into leadership positions to the dismay of a large number of Negro staff members who say the organization must be "black-led, black-controlled, and black-dominated." At the last general staff meeting, John Lewis and other leaders took the position that "whites must consent to let Negroes run their own revolution without being alarmed at the sacrifices and difficulties involved." SNCC leaders say "the majority" of the white staff understand why "black domination is a must," but the issue is far from settled and it is potentially explosive.

REBELS WITH CAUSE Continued

Beyond all that, SNCC is threatened by dangers without. Powerful forces—not all of them white—are alarmed by the growth of the organization and SNCC staffers believe they are organizing to crush it by isolating SNCC from the direct-action coalition (SNCC, SCLC, CORE) and by waving the "red" flag. SNCC is not now, nor has it ever been, an un-American organization. But its refusal to impose a loyalty oath on staff members has given critics a weapon which they have been using with increasing effectiveness. To disarm critics, friends have urged the organization to issue a routine "public relations statement" denouncing Communism and Communists. SNCC, so far, has refused, citing the SNCC answer that ends all arguments—"It would be dishonest."

Battle-oriented, SNCC has fleet of radio cars. Organization has continuing educational program for staff members who learn how to operate radios, business machines.

At Mount Beulah School, in Edwards, Mississippi, SNCC staffers participate in training session for Mississippi youth who signed up for projected "Freedom Corps."

"We have a positive program of nonviolent direct action," Executive Secretary James Forman says. We stand on our affirmative program. We don't ask people what they are. We don't have a security check or a loyalty oath."

The external pressure is likely to increase in the coming months. Can SNCC keep its soul and its effectiveness? Bob Parris says "the coming months will be crucial. We've been hated for a long time in the South, but we could always go to the North and be heroes. Now we may find ourselves isolated and destroyed in the North. We have to prepare ourselves for that. Somebody may have to be ploughed under. But, after all, that's what a revolution means."

And revolution, a nonviolent revolution, is what SNCC means. SNCC, John Lewis says, intends to go the distance. "We're going to be consistent with what we consider right. We're going to be honest. We are what we are. We are not the Students for a Democratic Society. We are not the Salvation Army. We are not the American Friends Service Committee. We are an organization, yet a movement of people with different backgrounds, ideas, hopes, aspirations, working for a just and open society. We are the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee."

In Jackson, Mississippi, office of SNCC-supported Council of Federated Organizations (COFO), Lorne Cress discusses organization's battlefield-like operations near poster (of arrests, incidents) which dramatizes dangerous life she has chosen to live.

Stopping traffic in Chicago's Loop, SNCC's Chicago director Fanny Rushing (r.) and SNCC supporters sprawl in street.

SNCC slogan, "One Man, One Vote," dominates placard carried by Selma demonstrator. Chairman John Lewis says SNCC is "a spark to begin the flame for basic social, economic, and political changes."

U. of North Carolina Forbids Talk by Aptheker

Communist Forced to Leave Campus for a Speech to 2,000 Students

CHAPEL HILL, N. C., March 9 (UPI) — A leading American Communist was barred from speaking at the University of North Carolina today, but spoke to about 2,000 students off the campus.

The Communist, Dr. Herbert Aptheker, director of the Institute of Marxist Studies in New York, previously had been barred twice from the campus because of a state law restricting speeches by Communists at state-supported colleges and universities.

Paul Dickson, president of the student body and chairman of the Committee for Free Inquiry, led Dr. Aptheker as far as a Confederate monument, where the talk was to be given, when the campus security chief, Arthur Beaumont, said:

"Paul, I want you to tell Dr. Aptheker that if he speaks he is breaking the law."

"Can I explain this to the students?" Dr. Aptheker asked.

"If you speak you'll be breaking the law," Mr. Beaumont said.

"I thought I had the rights of a citizen of the United States," Dr. Aptheker said. He headed for the sidewalk across a low stone wall separating the campus from the town.

"I'm sorry my appearance has turned into a spectacle and a circus," he said. He told the students that the state law was "medieval and absurd."

"The supreme law relative to this case in our land is the Bill of Rights," he said. "The trustees [of the university] and the chief of police are violating the law of the United States."

When Dr. Aptheker was introduced by Mr. Dickson, he was greeted by hoots, boos and applause. When he finished speaking, the students — estimated at 2,000 by campus police — applauded him for about one minute.

Mr. Dickson announced that Dr. Aptheker had received permission to speak at the nondenominational Community Church. He also had been granted the use of the town hall by Mayor Sandy McClamroch Jr.

In a special session last year, The North Carolina Legislature amended the law to allow trustees and administrators of the schools to use their discretion in permitting Communists access to campus facilities.

The university's trustees and its acting chancellor, Carlyle Sitterson, have twice rejected requests by campus groups to permit Dr. Aptheker speaking privileges since the law was amended.

Educators Warn of New Protests on Campuses

Kerr Finds Students Again Drifting Toward Activism

By PETER BART

Special to The New York Times

HOLLYWOOD, May 9—Leading edcucators warned today that the American university had entered a period of high peril that could lead to renewed student protest.

The warnings were sounded at a consultation on "the University in America," sponsored by the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, attended by some 1,500 educators.

Several prominent university presidents and professors proposed possible remedies to cope with student disaffection. But a panel of student activists bluntly rejected these and proposed a drastic overhaul of present university structure.

Clark Kerr, president of the University of California, said the present crisis in university life stemmed mainly from the widening "gap between the new mission of many professors and the new desires of some students."

Faculty members, Mr. Kerr said, have increasingly been withdrawn into specialized research at a time when "more students meanwhile wanted to gain from their education a personal and social philosophy as well as or even instead of a vocational skill."

Apathy to Activism

Faculty and students, he added, have therefore been drifting in opposite directions until "apathy has turned to activism."

Saul Landau, a graduate student at the University of California at Berkeley, said the revival of "a meaningful tradition" in university life would result only from the continued "guerrilla warfare" conducted by students and the "displaced intelligensia."

These rebels, Mr. Landau said, would conduct "intellectual warfare" against those universities that were set up solely to meet "the operational needs of the corporations and government" rather than "the needs of the moral man."

Viewpoint of Rebels

These points were echoed by other students addressing the convocation. They emphasized that students were rebelling against knowledge devoid of social meaning, and were seeking a greater role in the conduct of their university life.

Students have awakened to the fact that "the most vital part of their education lies beyond the classroom," said Margaret Anne Levi, a student at Bryn Mawr College.

While acknowledging the existence of a "crisis," Dr. Kerr said it was only a limited crisis confined largely to the humanities and social sciences. The more vocationally oriented facets of the university have been largely unaffected, he said.

"Much is being done—perhaps more than ever before," Dr. Kerr said, to deal with the limited crisis. Among the reforms, he said, were freshman seminars, better advising procedures, devotion of more faculty time to undergraduate students and introduction of pass-fail grading to eliminate unhealthy competition for marks.

Perhaps the most dramatic reform, he continued, has been the introduction of the principle of the "cluster college" now being applied at the university's new San Diego and Santa Cruz campuses.

Dr. Rosemary Park

This concept calls for the establishment not of a monolithic campus but of a cluster of smaller colleges, sharing some common academic facilities—a structure used by Oxford and Cambridge.

"A university cannot be small but it can seem small to its indicidual participants," Dr. Kerr said.

Turning to the trend toward greater student activism, Dr. Kerr warned that "too often now this involvement takes the form of simplistic slogans and even occasionally that of violent or potentially violent action."

"Neither the slogans nor the actions are at a very high intellectual level," he observed.

This view was reiterated by Dr. Rosemary Park, president of Barnard College, who urged fellow administrators "to insist

Remedies for Disaffection in Universities Are Debated that it is a privilege to be a student, not a right, that the university is no welfare state open to all but only to those who will develop an intellectual conscience and accept the discipline which comes with specialized knowledge."

Dr. Park emphasized, however that the university now found itself "in dangerous times when student dissatisfaction with education has never been more strident nor faculty disinterest in the institution they serve more apparent."

She noted that university administrators today "find ourselves in a paradoxical situation, respected outside but within our institutions suspected by those we must serve."

The concern voiced by Dr. Kerr and Dr. Park about the present status of the university was echoed by, among others, J. Douglas Brown, dean of the faculty, Princeton University; John Weiss, associate professor of history at Wayne State University; Robert M. Hutchins, president of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, and W. H. Ferry, vice president of the center, which is sponsoring the convocation.

John Seeley, professor of sociology at Brandeis University, took a more generous view of student thinking.

"As youth calls for freedom now," he said, "so also it calls for an end now to the mountainous structure of institutionalized pretense and choking hypocricy within which we find ourselves in the last gasps of suffocation."

"Call such innocence primitivism, if you wish," he went on, "but let it carry then not merely the note of recall but renewal, not only a simplicity but a fresh start."

Dear Friend:

We are sending you the enclosed fact sheet which provides information regarding the Upland Institute, an institution which offers a unique program of training for students wishing to prepare for service with agencies and movements involved in non-violent social change.

The Institute, now in its second year, offers courses in history, techniques, and theory of social change. Academic work is correlated with practical field training.

We are now seeking to recruit students for our 1967-68 class. If you or your students are interested in further information about the Institute, we cordially invite you to write to the Director of Studies, Upland Institute, Upland Avenue, Chester, Pennsylvania.

Sincerely yours,

TRAINING FOR LEADERSHIP IN SOCIAL CHANGE

BASIC CURRICULUM — One year graduate study leading to certification through seminars, reading programs, field work, individual projects, lectures by authorities in the field of social action.

FOR WHOM? — Students with a BA degree or equivalent training and experience who are preparing for full-time or volunteer work with agencies involved in social change.

WHAT ARE THE AREAS OF CONCENTRATION? — The major conflict areas in American society today. Such as: the freedom movement, full employment, urban development, problems in inter-group relations, community education, and action for peace and international order.

WHAT DOES FIELD TRAINING INVOLVE? — Work with agencies involved in social change provide a background of practical experience, develop usable techniques, and tests aptitudes for such work.

LOCATED WHERE THE PROBLEMS ARE, in Chester, Pennsylvania, the heart of Delaware Valley, an industrial urban area extending from Philadelphia to Wilmington, Delaware and beyond. The Institute is housed on the campus of the Crozer-Chester Medical Center and the Crozer Theological Seminary, Chester, Pa.

COST — Tuition, fees, board and room in dormitory — maximum of $1100. Limited scholarships are available on the basis of need.

A FACULTY academically qualified and experienced in areas of social change, augmented by visiting lecturers who in 1965-67 included:

Mr. Saul Alinsky
Dr. Kenneth Boulding
Dr. Staughton Lynd
Dr. Arthur Waskow
Mr. Norman Hill
Mr. Norman Thomas
Mr. A. J. Muste
Dr. Harold Lewis
Mr. Bayard Rustin
Dr. Robert Gilmore

The Upland Institute is based on the concept that change is inherent in human institutions and attitudes, and that the growing complexity of contemporary society necessitates rapid and often drastic change if pressing human problems are to be met in a constructive manner. At a time of increasing reliance upon violence to achieve social change, we believe that man's intellectual abilities, his accumulated knowledge, and resources which spring from religious and secular insights and social heritage can be used to train men and women to engage in the processes of social change through non-violent, democratic methods.

GEORGIA STUDENTS FOR HUMAN RIGHTS
52 FAIRLIE STREET, N.W.
ATLANTA, GEORGIA 30303

Dear Student,

Would you be interested in working with other Georgia students to improve human relations in our state?

Would you be interested in working with an organization of Georgia students dedicated to this purpose?

In an organization called the Georgia Students for Human Rights, the foundations have been laid. The GSHR was formed in February, 1964 by a group of interested students from several college campuses in the Atlanta area. The formation of the group stemmed from the need for communication and participation in the civil rights movement among college students. As interest in the GSHR grew, the Atlanta meetings were attended by larger numbers of both white and Negro students, some of whom were interested in direct action, others were interested in community work projects, and/or surveys and research.

Many students attending other colleges throughout Georgia, particularly the University of Georgia, expresses interest in expanding the organization on a state-wide basis. The organization did become state-wide. They held a conference and started work on specific programs. However, when the year ended many of the officers and members graduated and the organization became inactive.

Now, in 1966, Georgia students are again feeling the need for the GSHR. Georgia students are seeing the Georgia Students for Human Rights as a way to step toward progress and moderation.

Why have a state-wide organization? A state-wide organization is valuable on three levels: the state, the region and the campus.

State-wide, the organization could serve to coordinate activities. For example, "Operation Search," a program to recruit capable people to attend college, could be initiated or a program to assist poor people in making application for welfare or related programs could be run by students. The state-wide functions could also include publishing a newsletter.

On a regional level, the program could include exchanges between campuses in an area, as well as work on employment or school desegregation problems.

At the campus level, the group could work on specific campus issues such as, academic freedom, university reform, etc. and benefit from ideas and techniques used on various campuses.

Is there a need for such an organization? Many Georgians, both adult and students, say, "yes." They feel that in 1966, the need for students to work for better human relations is as great as, if not greater than in past years.

Are Georgia students willing to work with such an organization? To be frank we don't know. Therefore, we are writing you on behalf on the many people, across the State who have expressed an interest. Enclosed is a response sheet on which we are requesting that you tell us what you think about the GSHR.

Thank you

Sincerely,

Paul Wahrhaftig

MEMORANDUM

TO: STATE COUNCIL EXECUTIVE DIRECTORS

FROM: J. MERVIN STANFIELD

SUBJECT: RECRUITMENT OF NEGRO BOYS TO ATTEND TOP SOUTHERN PREP SCHOOLS

We have been asked to help find eighteen (18) Negro boys to integrate the top six prep schools in the South. (It happens that all of the schools, which were chosen on the basis of academic ranking only, were boys' schools.) All six have agreed to cooperate in order to break the color barrier at the same time. The program, including all necessary scholarship aid, is being financed by a wealthy individual.

The problem is to find eighteen boys who are both interested and qualified to enter the ninth grade of one of these schools in September of 1967. That means that they must be boys in the eighth grade this fall. Each must have an IQ of 115 or more and must be from the South.

The program will provide, as needed, up to full expenses -- including tuition, fees, books, room and board, laundry, and other incidental costs -- for completion of the student's secondary education at one of the prep schools. Applicants need not be from low-income families, however, and where the family is able to pay all or part of the cost complete expenses would not be offered.

Provision is also being made for two months of orientation and tutoring beginning in June of 1967.

All students recommended will be sent simple tests to be taken at home. The most promising will then be interviewed at their homes by a representative of the donor, and the choices will be made after the interviews are completed. For purposes of this procedure a good field of candidates is desired, but not a flood of candidates -- lest too many disappointments be caused. This is why we are being asked to recommend students instead of their being recruited through public announcement.

Those responsible for this program do not perceive it as primarily to help the eighteen students. It is frankly designed to help the prep schools come to terms with social change.

Could we have your first recommendations within three weeks?

Dear Aubrey:

Emory Via, Director of our Labor Project, and I would like to have more information as early as possible about the role we are to play in the Virginia conference on religion and race.

By the way, I was in the regional office of the National Catholic Council for Interracial Justice last Thursday, and they share my feeling that your conference is going to turn out to be first rate.

Best wishes,

Dear Auggie:

With reference to my memorandum of August 12, do you plan to submit the names of any Negro boys who might enter a southern prep school next fall?

Best wishes,

Dear Dr. Witherspoon:

This is just to follow up on my correspondence with you and Mr. John J. Doyle in August. We are interested in Austin and in Texas and are eager to render any service we can to your organization.

As you know, Mr. Marvin Wall of our office visited Austin while you were away and talked to Mr. Doyle and others from CCIOHR. His report was highly complimentary.

I hope to be in Dallas in the near future to explore the possibility of a human relations council in that city. If possible I would like to visit Austin also, and I wonder if you have a regular meeting date on which I could arrange my visit.

Best wishes,

FACTS ABOUT

the

and

REDEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

NO. I

(1) WHAT IS THE PURPOSE OF THE STAR, INC. ANTI-POVERTY PROGRAM?

The purpose of this program is to:

1. Prepare low-income and undereducated adults in Mississippi for vocational training and employment opportunities now being made available by the State's rapid industrial growth.

2. Mobilize the State and local resources of Mississippi and its people to combat, on a continuing basis, poverty and illiteracy.

To accomplish this, 15 training and redevelopment centers will be established throughout the state to conduct classes in basic education -- reading, writing, arithmetic and social studies -- with an emphasis to preparing for jobs. In addition, the centers will provide counseling services, job placement and training referral, and will carry out extensive work in local job development and community action.

(2) WHAT IS THE NAME AND ADDRESS OF THE STATE AGENCY DIRECTING THE PROGRAM AND WHO IS ITS DIRECTOR?

STAR, Inc., located at 1201 First National Bank Bldg., Jackson, Mississippi, is the state agency directing the program. Dr. W. T. Bush is Executive Director of STAR, Inc. This is a private, non-profit corporation which is run by a Board of Directors representative of the civic, religious, business, government, labor and minority elements of the state. The Executive Director, Dr. Bush, is a native Mississippian with a wide background in education and administration.

(3) WHAT IS THE OFFICIAL NAME OF THE FEDERAL LEGISLATION CREATING THE STAR PROGRAM?

The federal legislation under which STAR operates is the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 and the Manpower Development and Training Act.

(4) WHO IS THE NATIONAL ADMINISTRATOR AND WHAT IS HIS ADDRESS AND TITLE?

The national administrators are: Sargent Shriver, who is the national Director of the Office of Economic Opportunity in Washington, D. C., and Curtis C. Aller, who is Director of the Office of Manpower, Automation and Training, U. S. Department of Labor.

(5) WHAT IS THE TOTAL AMOUNT OF MONEY INVOLVED IN MISSISSIPPI?

At this time, approximately $8,000,000 is approved for the STAR program. This excludes the local contribution made by the Diocese of Natchez-Jackson as the local sponsor of the program.

(6) WHY IS THE CATHOLIC CHURCH INVOLVED IN THIS PROGRAM?

The Catholic Diocese of Natchez-Jackson has the type of statewide organization and physical facilities at its disposal which a program such as this requires. Additionally, the diocese has a long history of concern for the poor; it is intimately aware of the conditions and problems of poverty in Mississippi, and is prepared and willing at this time to involve itself to the fullest extent permitted by the Federal Government in just such a program as STAR, Inc. In view of this, the Diocese took the initiative in submitting the original proposal for STAR with the approval of both Mississippi and Federal Government officials.

(7) IS THERE ANY MONETARY ADVANTAGE TO THE CHURCH, AND IF SO, HOW MUCH?

There will be no monetary gain to the Catholic Church from this program. In fact, the Church is actually contributing some $500,000 to the STAR program in the form of physical facilities (classrooms and office space and equipment, building facilities, etc.) as well as making available to the program the services of its professional members and established organizations such as the diocesan newspaper.

(8) WILL PARTICIPANTS BE GIVEN ANY RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION?

The STAR, Inc. program is entirely non-sectarian in content and purpose. As required by law, participants will not under any circumstances receive religious training or proselytization. Any religious objects and instructional material will be either covered or removed from the diocesan buildings during the time they are in use by the STAR program, if this is at all possible.

(9) WILL ADMINISTRATIVE PERSONNEL, STATE-WIDE OR LOCAL, BE RESTRICTED TO MEMBERS OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH?

Program personnel in every instance will be hired on the basis of his own qualifications without regard to his religious beliefs or affiliations and in strict compliance with the Equal Opportunity Act of 1965.

(10) HOW DOES THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT RECONCILE THIS COUNTRY'S TRADITIONAL POSITION ON THE PRINCIPLE OF SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE WITH STAR, INC. BEING HANDLED BY A RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION?

The welfare of the poor has always been one of the major concerns of all religious bodies. Recognizing the long history and experience which churches and church-related organizations have in dealing with the multiple problems of the poor, the Federal Government, in designing the Economic Opportunity Act, did not exclude these organizations as sponsors of Economic Opportunity projects but rather included in the guidelines, special provisions relating to situations in which the church or church-related organizations would be involved to assure that the principle of separation of Church and State would not thereby be abused. Briefly, these guidelines state: none of the OEO grants shall be used for the teaching of religion, religious proselytization or worship and that such will not be connected with any program supported in whole or in part by OEO grants; that admission shall not be based directly or indirectly on religious affiliation; that textbooks and facilities used in OEO programs will be devoid of sectarian content or influence; and that grant funds may not be used to pay any cost which would ordinarily be incurred by the church or organization in their regular operation.

It should also be added that the Diocese of Natchez-Jackson does not have administrative control of the STAR program; control rests entirely with the Board of Directors of STAR, Inc., the legal corporation chartered to administer the program.

(11) HOW WILL REPRESENTATIVES OF OTHER FAITHS BE BROUGHT INTO THE PROGRAM?

The STAR program will make no appeal based on faith to either personnel or trainees. All recruitment of trainees will be impartial and based on need and eligibility.

(12) WILL CHURCH FACILITIES BE USED AS MEETING PLACES? IF SO, HOW WILL THE PROGRAM AVOID THIS BEING A DETERRENT TO PARTICIPATION OF THOSE OF OTHER FAITHS?

Church facilities will be used at most of the training centers as part of the STAR facilities. Program officials will seek to avoid this being a source of conflict by establishing good relations and communication with local communities in order to familiarize them thoroughly with the STAR program, assuring them that STAR is for their benefit and that their religious convictions will not affect their participation in the program. As mentioned previously, areas used in STAR programs will be devoid of religious articles or references.

(13) WILL LOCAL COMMUNITIES HAVE ANY VOICE IN THE POLICY AND ADMINISTRATION OF THE STAR CENTER LOCATED IN THEIR AREA?

A local Advisory Committee will be appointed from every community where a STAR center is located. This group will serve the center in its area as a local advisory and coordinating agency between the center and the community.

(14) WHO WILL SERVE ON THE LOCAL ADVISORY COMMITTEES AND HOW WILL THEY BE APPOINTED?

The local Advisory Committees, or Boards, for STAR Training Centers will be appointed by STAR, Inc. after the members of these Boards have been approved by the Board of Directors of STAR, Inc. In approving members to serve on the local Advisory Boards, the Board of the Corporation will act in strict compliance with the guidelines set forth in the Community Action Guide, Vol. I, issued by the Office of Economic Opportunity. Basically, these guidelines state that there must be broadly based representation from the local community, including representatives from private and public agencies (including at least one representative of the chief elected official or officials), concerned with the welfare of the general community; other elements in the community as a whole, and the population to be served by the Community Action program. "Particular attention should be paid to ensuring adequate minority group representation in cases where minority group members comprise a large proportion of the population of the 'target' areas..." CAP Guidelines also state: "In the selection process, there should be maximum possible involvement of the groups and persons to be represented. The selection process should be designed to encourage the use, whenever feasible, of traditional democratic approaches and techniques such as group forums and discussions, nominations and balloting."

As for the number of members on each local Advisory Board, the board should be large enough to insure the broad representation mentioned above but should not exceed 15 who will be actively involved.

(15) HOW MANY TRAINING CENTERS ARE THERE IN MISSISSIPPI? WHERE ARE THEY? HOW WERE THEY SELECTED?

There will be 15 centers with classes being conducted at 19 different locations. (The Jackson Center will conduct classes at two locations in Jackson. The DeLisle Center will conduct classes at DeLisle, Pass Christian, Bay St. Louis and Kiln.) Centers are located at:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Biloxi | Canton | Natchez | Greenville |
| Gulfport | Carthage | Clarksdale | Yazoo City |
| DeLisle | Philadelphia | Mound Bayou | Holly Springs |
| Jackson | Meridian | Greenwood | |

Their selection was made on the basis of local need and desire for such a program, the lack of a comparable CAP program in the area and available facilities.

(16) WHAT TYPE PERSON WILL BE ELIGIBLE FOR TRAINING THE STAR, INC. PROGRAM?

Eligibility for STAR training programs is determined by the following basic criteria:

(1) Adults between the ages (generally) of 18-60, especially those who are family breadwinners;

(2) Income for individual or family is below poverty level;

(3) Little or no education or whose education is so critically deficient as to render person functional illiterate;

(4) A desire to take part in STAR basic literacy courses and job preparation training;

(5) That individual be able to benefit from these courses. (STAR, Inc. must exclude from its training program those who are so physically or mentally handicapped that they could not be trained in the ordinary manner of the class. This restriction is necessary because of staff deficiencies and limited time.)

(17) WHO DETERMINES HIS ELIGIBILITY AND HOW IS HE RECRUITED?

Eligibility is determined by testing, screening and personal evaluation under the direction of professional social workers and counselors. As for recruitment, local Recruiters will be hired by STAR, Inc. for this purpose. These Recruiters will in most instances be low-income people living in the local community. Volunteer recruiters are also requested by STAR and will be utilized. Methods will include direct contact, speaking engagements, public announcements and publicity, etc.

(18) WHO INSTRUCTS THESE PEOPLE? WHAT QUALIFICATIONS ARE INSTRUCTORS REQUIRED TO HAVE?

Each STAR training location will have a full-time teaching staff. They will include a Supervising Instructor, three Instructors and four Assistant Instructors. It is desired that the Supervising Instructor and three Instructors at each center have a degree in education and experience in teaching and/or professional fields; for Assistant Instructors, a high school education is the educational requirement. However, STAR, Inc. recognizes the shortage of such highly qualified teachers and will adjust to this by accepting related experience and personal qualifications which lend themselves to the needs of the program. All STAR, Inc. Instructors will receive special training and orientation in preparation for the specialized teaching required of them in the STAR program. As other programs throughout the country have proven that qualification is as much a personal matter as a technical one and that a teacher's certificate is not always the only valid measure of talent and ability, the administrators of STAR, Inc. believe that this is the most satisfactory method of obtaining qualified local people as instructors without, at the same time, encroaching upon the needs of the local public school system and other public and private agencies in the community. The Director of Education ahd his associates at the Central Office of STAR, Inc. will maintain close contact with the Instructors to assure maximum effectiveness of teaching methods and materials.

(19) HOW LONG IS THE COURSE OF INSTRUCTION? WHAT IS ITS ULTIMATE GOAL?

The courses presently are scheduled to run in 3-month cycles. If this is found to be inadequate for the aims of the program, modifications will be made as necessary and as possible. The ultimate goal of the courses is to provide the trainee with the reading, writing and comprehension skills, as well as an associative knowledge in other fields, which will enable him to get a job and stay in a job that provides a living wage. Academically, the goal is to bring the student to a sixth grade achievement level.

(20) WHAT IS A "GRADUATE" OF STAR CLASSES ABLE TO DO WHEN HE FINISHES THAT HE WAS NOT ABLE TO DO BEFORE?

The results of the courses depend very much on the individual himself -- his own limitations, native ability and motivation. However, it is the intention of the STAR program to place its trainees in jobs, or training leading to jobs, after they have completed the basic education courses. In almost every instance, these jobs would not have been available to the individual because he could not read or mentally grasp instructions for performing the job, because he did not know how to apply for the job in the first place, and because he lacked the confidence, and in many instances, the initiative, to meet the demands of the job and work productively with others.

It is also the intention of STAR that its trainees will be imbued with a sense of their own personal worth as individuals, and that as a result of STAR's training, they will be able to move within realistic grasp of a life of dignity and security and opportunities for personal growth and development.

(21) WILL TRAINEES OR STUDENTS BE BROUGHT IN FROM ALL PARTS OF MISSISSIPPI TO THE RESPECTIVE CENTERS, OR WILL MORE CENTERS BE ESTABLISHED?

Each STAR, Inc. training center will serve an area of 50 miles in radius generally. The conditions of the STAR, Inc. program and the funds available to it at this time do not provide for coverage of the entire state. STAR, Inc. in this respect, can only do part of the total job that needs to be done as regards poverty in Mississippi. It is the hope of STAR, Inc. that similar programs will be set up by local community action groups according to local needs in those areas where no such program is now available. To this end, STAR, Inc. is making available its professional advice and service and is prepared to give every possible assistance to those desiring to obtain Federal funds for a local Community Action or Development program.

(22) IS A TRAINEE OR STUDENT PAID ANYTHING WHILE BEING TRAINED? IF SO, HOW MUCH AND FOR HOW LONG?

Under the terms of the STAR program, trainees may be provided a small weekly subsistence, based on relative need during the time they are enrolled in and attending classes.

(23) FOR WHAT ADDITIONAL TRAINING IS A GRADUATE ELIGIBLE? WHERE DOES HE GET IT? IS HE PAID FOR THIS ADDITIONAL TRAINING? WHAT IS THE ULTIMATE GOAL OF THIS POST GRADUATE TRAINING?

Graduates are eligible for on-the-job training, any training program sponsored by OEO or OMAT or MDTA, state sponsored training programs, and any other training or education which they might wish to pursue, depending on personal initiative and capability. At this time, STAR, Inc. has only one center where a separate Vocational Training component will be conducted. This is at Greenwood, Mississippi. Otherwise, STAR, Inc. will refer graduates to existing state and federal programs, providing follow-up services and counseling. Students involved in STAR sponsored vocational training will be eligible for the maximum weekly subsistence. The ultimate goal of this is that the person obtain a decent job which pays a living wage.

(24) HOW MANY MISSISSIPPIANS ARE ELIGIBLE FOR THE STAR TRAINING PROGRAM? ARE RURAL PEOPLE INCLUDED?

According to the 1960 census there were 2,178,141 people in the state of Mississippi. Of these, there are 1,064,976 over the age of 25. Of this number, 160,015 have less than a 4th grade education and 40,640 have no formal school training at all. Another statistic states that 51.6% of the families in Mississippi have an annual income of less than $3,000. From this, it can be deduced that there are some 100,000 or more who are eligible for the STAR, Inc. training programs. The 1960 census also reveals that 1,357,336 Mississippians live in the rural areas. This is 62.3% of the total populations. In view of this, it can be further deduced that a large percentage of those taking part in the STAR, Inc. programs will be from the rural areas. In addition, many of the STAR centers are located in areas which are predominately rural.

(25) HOW MUCH STAFF PERSONNEL IS INVOLVED AT THE TRAINING CENTER LEVEL? HOW ARE THESE PEOPLE SELECTED? ARE THEY NATIVE TO THE COMMUNITY INVOLVED?

The average Center will be staffed as follows:

|---|---|
| Center Director | Community Action Specialist |
| Supervising Instructor | Job Development Specialist |
| Three Instructors | Four Recruiters |
| Four Assistant Instructors | Executive Secretary |
| Two Counselors | Custodian-Maintenance Man (part-time) |
| Social Worker | |

The Center staff, as well as all STAR, Inc. personnel, will be hired on the basis of individual qualifications and experience, and with the exception of clerical personnel, must be approved by the Executive Director and the appropriate department head at the Central Office. Whenever possible, people from the local community will be hired for the Center staff.

(26) WHAT DOES THE PROGRAM REQUIRE AS TO INTERRACIAL PARTICIPATION IN SUPERVISORY PERSONNEL, TEACHERS, ADVISORY COMMITTEES, AND STUDENTS?

All STAR, Inc. staff and personnel, its Advisory Committees and student trainees will be selected in strict adherence to the principles set forth under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Equal Opportunity Act of 1965. i.e., there will be no discrimination on the basis of race, religion, color, sex or national origin. This adherence is demanded by both the Office of Economic Opportunity and the Office of Manpower, Automation and Training.

(27) IF THE BUSINESS COMMUNITY THROUGH ITS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE WANTS TO BE DESIGNATED AS A TRAINING CENTER, WHAT MUST THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE DO?

In order for a community to obtain a funded Community Program or a STAR, Inc. component program, the first necessary step is the forming of a sponsoring organization which would be representative of all elements of the community -- business, religion, labor, minority groups, representatives of the poor, etc. The next steps would be to draft a suggested program and submit it in proposal form to the proper agency. The local Office of Economic Opportunity, which is directed by Mr. Martin Fraley, should be consulted at the beginning for advice, guidance and direction.

(28) WHAT FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITIES ARE PLACED UPON COMMUNITIES DESIGNATED AS LOCATIONS FOR STAR TRAINING CENTERS?

The basic local responsibility of communities in which a STAR, Inc. Training Center is located is to provide the physical plant - classrooms, office space, meeting rooms, rest rooms, etc. No financial contribution as such is required by STAR, Inc. from the local community.

(29) IS THERE ANY DIRECT COOPERATION REQUIRED OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS - MAYORS, BOARDS OF SUPERVISORS, ETC.?

STAR, Inc. depends heavily upon the support and cooperation of local public officials and agencies to realize the overall objectives of its program. In its fight against illiteracy and poverty, STAR, Inc. will seek to mobilize the resources of Mississippi and its people against these twin evils. Public officials can play a major role in helping local communities to relate to STAR, Inc. and also in helping STAR to best serve the needs of the area. Coordination between STAR and public agencies such as the Health Department, Guidance Centers, Welfare Departments, etc. is also needed in order to serve best those people who have long lived under the stress and deprivation of illiteracy and involuntary poverty.

(30) IS THERE ANY RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN STAR, INC. AND THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS?

STAR, Inc. is hopeful that public schools will initiate adult education courses wherein graduates of the STAR, Inc. training program will be able to pursue educational advancement and to which students who do not qualify for STAR training but who need additional education can be referred.

(31) HOW LONG IS THE STAR, INC. PROGRAM SCHEDULED TO LAST?

Under the terms of its present funding, STAR, Inc. is scheduled to run until August, 1967. There is a possibility that the program will be extended beyond that time.

(32) WHAT SIZE STAFF IS CONTEMPLATED STATEWIDE?

STAR, Inc. will employ approximately 365 persons to carry out the various aspects of the program. Most of these will be native Mississippians. In some instances, however, when properly qualified personnel are not available, these positions will be filled by persons from outside the state.

(33) WHERE DOES THE FINAL AUTHORITY REST FOR DETERMINING WHO SHALL BE EMPLOYED ON THE STATE AND LOCAL STAFFS?

The Executive Director of STAR, Inc., except for his own position, will be responsible for the appointments to any position in the Central Office with the approval of the Executive Board of Directors. The Executive Director and the Executive Board will also be responsible for the appointment of all Center Directors and the top administrative Center staff. Center staff appointments, of course, will be made in consultation with the appointed Center Director. Appointments to lesser positions can be made by the Center Director himself. STAR, Inc. will be an Equal Opportunity employer for all applications throughout the state and all personnel will be employed only on the basis of merit, training and qualifications for the position applied for.

(34) TO WHOM SHOULD AN OEGANIZATION OR GROUP OF INDIVIDUALS IN THE COMMUNITY GO FOR INFORMATION?

The Center Director of the local center should be contacted for specific information regarding the training program and other activities of that center. For information regarding the overall STAR program, and its policies, contact the Central Office of STAR, Inc., 1201 First National Bank Building, Jackson, Mississippi, telephone: 948-3113.

The U. S. Commission on Civil Rights

The U. S. Commission on Civil Rights is an independent, bipartisan agency established by Congress under the 1957 Civil Rights Act and authorized by the Civil Rights Acts of 1957, 1960, and 1964 to:

Voting

. . . Investigate complaints alleging that citizens are being deprived of their right to vote by reason of their race, color, religion or national origin.

. . . Investigate allegations of vote fraud.

Equal Protection of the Laws

. . . Collect and study information concerning legal developments constituting a denial of equal protection of the laws under the Constitution.

Clearinghouse

. . . Serve as a national clearinghouse for civil rights information.

Reports

. . . Submit reports of its activities, findings and recommendations to the President and the Congress.

The Commission is not an enforcement agency and has no power to provide specific remedies in individual cases. It refers complaints of denials of rights to the appropriate Federal administrative agency for corrective action.

Six Commissioners, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, determine policy for the agency. A Staff Director, also a Presidential appointee, supervises the professional and clerical staff of more than 100.

The Commission's field offices in Memphis, Tennessee and Chicago, Illinois, aid the agency in all of its programs.

STAFF ORGANIZATION

Commission programs are implemented through four major staff divisions. The Federal Programs Division evaluates Federal civil rights policies and their implementation and serves as liaison with other Federal agencies on civil rights matters. The Field Services Division directs field activities for the agency and is responsible for the coordination of field offices and the supervision of the 51 State Advisory Committees. The Research Division maintains a library of civil rights materials and develops short term as well as more extensive research projects. The Office of the General Counsel handles the agency's legal work and directs its voting projects. Complaints alleging denials of equal protection of the laws should be forwarded to the Office of the General Counsel.

The Commission also includes an Office of the Staff Director, an Office of Business Administration, and an Information Office which maintains liaison with news media, public and private groups, and the general public and, edits Commission publications.

PUBLIC HEARINGS

The Commission travels throughout the nation for fact-finding hearings relating to civil rights problems. Such hearings have been held in Jackson, Mississippi; Montgomery, Alabama; New Orleans, Louisiana; Atlanta, Georgia; Chicago, Illinois; Washington, D. C.; Los Angeles and San Francisco, California; Detroit, Michigan; Phoenix, Arizona; Newark, New Jersey; New York, New York; and Indianapolis, Indiana. Hearing rules safeguard the rights of every individual who appears before the Commission. Using the subpena power granted by Congress, the Commission seeks facts from local officials and other citizens representing diverse interests and points of view. The Civil Rights Act of 1960 and 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and some presidential executive orders reflect findings and recommendations resulting from Commission hearings and studies.

REPORTS

Major investigations and research projects have been conducted by the Commission staff relating to the denial of equal protection of the laws in voting, education, employment, housing and the administration of justice. Published Commission studies also deal with differences in the opportunities available to Negroes and whites in the armed forces and in programs of the Departments of Agriculture; Health, Education and Welfare; Labor and other Federal agencies.

CONFERENCES

The Commission sponsors national, regional and state conferences as part of its fact-gathering function and as a method of disseminating information to specialized audiences. These conferences bring together Federal, State and local officials, representatives of business, labor and civil rights groups, and community leaders to consider school desegregation, employment, equal housing opportunities, the 1964 Civil Rights Act, and other civil rights matters.

STATE ADVISORY COMMITTEES

More than 600 citizens from every state and the District of Columbia who are familiar with state and local civil rights problems serve without compensation on the 51 Advisory Committees to the Commission. These committees constitute a unique resource for securing information based on the experience and insight of persons with first-hand knowledge of problems in every part of the country. The committees also disseminate information on Federal law and policies.

The Commission often publishes reports prepared by the State Advisory Committees.

CLEARINGHOUSE

The Commission is a national clearinghouse for information relating to denials of Federal rights because of race, color, religion or national origin, including—but not limited to—the fields of voting, education, housing, employment, the use of public facilities and transportation and the administration of justice.

Under the clearinghouse function assigned by the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Commission collects, publishes and disseminates information to promote a better understanding of constitutional and statutory requirements relating to civil rights. Commission conferences and staff consultations help Federal, State and local governments as well as private institutions and individuals develop techniques for dealing with specific problems in the civil rights field.

PUBLICATIONS

A complete listing of Commission publications—statutory reports, interim reports, staff reports, state advisory committee reports, and transcripts of hearings and conferences—can be obtained by writing the Information Office of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. Most of the agency's published works are available in depository libraries throughout the country.

New Source of Skills for Business and Industry

TYPE OF TRAINING

STAR's basic education will include reading, writing, arithmetic, social studies, and skills needed for obtaining employment.

WHO IS ELIGIBLE

Unemployed and underemployed adults between the ages of 18 to 60 who have less than 6 years of formal education.

CONDUCTING AGENCY

STAR, INC—is the private, non-profit corporation chartered to carry out the training program which is sponsored by a grant from the U. S. Office of Economic Opportunity and the Office of Manpower Automation and Training of U. S. Department of Labor. The Catholic Diocese of Natchez-Jackson initiated the program and has contributed space for training centers, but does not exercise administrative control over the STAR project.

STAR, Inc. is administered by a statewide representative, non-denominational Board of Directors.

A Basic Step Toward Developing MANPOWER For Mississippi's Future

DURING the last two decades new methods of farming in Mississippi have significantly decreased the jobs available in the state, causing a serious threat of unemployment in many areas. Between 1950 and 1960, the state's non-farm rural population increased by 16% as opposed to the national increase of 2%.

AT THE SAME TIME Mississippi has experienced rapid industrial development. During the last five years alone more than 450 new industries have surged into the state bringing over $500,000,000 in capital investment and creating almost 40,000 new jobs. Expansion of existing industries has created an additional 20,000 positions. Mississippi's predominantly agricultural labor force is not prepared for these jobs.

EDUCATION is the key to this dilemma. Forty-eight percent of the state's citizens over age 25 have only an eighth grade education or less; some 4% have no education at all. Thousands of these people have always depended upon farming as the only means of earning their living and are totally unprepared for the demands of modern industry. They lack not only technical skills required by industry but more importantly, they lack the basic education needed in order to qualify for on-the-job-training or for the vocational training programs offered by the state and federal governments.

THE PURPOSE of STAR, Inc. is to bridge this educational gap and thus to help Mississippi develop her greatest potential resource—MANPOWER. By providing basic literacy education and the personal guidance and training necessary for job training, vocational training and gainful employment, STAR, Inc. will help to redevelop Mississippi's displaced farm workers and other unskilled work forces into a well-trained and professionally competent labor force which can meet industry's demands.

Equal Tax Evaluation Issue Has Long History of Defeat

3/13/66

TENNESSEE

By JOE HATCHER

Staff Writer, The Nashville Tennessean
Special to The Journal-Constitution

NASHVILLE, Tenn. March 12 — Either the legislature or the people, or both, have blocked every effort made in Tennessee since 1834 to change the constitutional provision for assessing property for taxation at full value.

Under the system grown up over 100 years, the state suffers from everything but equal assessments, ranging from 7 to 50 per cent according to the counties. Now it faces up to a federal court decree that the railroads and utilities cannot be assessed at full value and other properties at whatever rate the local assesser decides.

Now Gov. Frank Clement brings the 1965 legislature into extra-session Monday to take at least one step toward doing something about the state's predicament, although his proposals appear to do little more than postpone a showdown until 1970 at least, and perhaps years beyond.

THE GOVERNOR proposes an amendment to the constitution that will permit classification of property for taxation ad valorem. Thus far in legislative history such a proposal has been interpreted as a means for a state income tax, denied under the provisions that all property must be assessed alike and equal.

Thus Gov. Clement's main purpose in calling the extra-session is seen politically as a smokescreen on taxes to extend the issue beyond his term while scattering around the $20 million surplus in the treasury to help his own campaign for the U.S. Senate.

Unlike Georgia, there was no machinery in the state whereby equitable adjustment can be made in assessing property for taxation.

Moreover that's the last thing the legislature itself wants to do. At least three legislatures must be elected on the tax issue before any constitutional tax relief can be granted. Thus there can be no stigma to any of Gov. Clement's action in merely proposing change at some future, indefinite date.

THE STATE has tried to make adjustments at times in the past. In 1919 the legislature declined to approve a proposed amendment for classifying property. Gov. A. H. Roberts then got a law whereby he could penalize counties that did not assess at full value. He was immediately beaten by a Republican, the last the state has had.

Then in 1925 Gov. Austin Peay got legislative approval of a propasal to classify property for taxation, but the 1927 legislature refused the two-thirds vote of approval necessary to submit the plan to the people.

In 1945 a tax commission made an exhaustive study and proposed a number of tax amendments. The legislature first refused to approve a limited constitutional convention, then voted down the entire series of tax proposals.

GOV. GORDON BROWNING in 1949 got legislative approval of a limited convention call, but the people voted that down by a narrow margin — because it included a tax revision provision. Then without the assessment section, the people did approve the 1953 convention which changed the charter for the first time since 1870 — but with no charges in the tax structure.

Since that time two rather insignificant conventions have been called, making sure that no tax proposals were included or could be considered. The constitution forbids submission of amendments oftener than five years. Thus the 1965 convention, which is still in technical session, defers action until 1970 at best.

Images Clash in Tennessee Race

By Bill Kovach
Special to The Washington Post

NASHVILLE, April 12—The scene is set for head-on conflict, admitted or not, between

Campaign '66

Johnson and Kennedy factions of the Democratic Party in Tennessee's gubernatorial race.

Buford Ellington, 58, former Governor and recently resigned as head of the U.S. Office of Emergency Planning, brought the Johnson image into the race when he formally announced today.

He has placed himself and his organization in the path of 36-year-old Nashville attorney John Jay Hooker Jr., who announced last month for the Democratic nomination in the August primary. Hooker is a personal friend of the Kennedy family and worked on the national level in the late President's campaign.

In their announcements, both candidates firmly denied that they would receive "outside" help in their campaigns. Both flatly stated they would neither ask for nor encourage such support.

ELLINGTON BUFORD

JOHN J. HOOKER JR.

. . . rival standard-bearers in gubernatorial race

But such strong statements of independence have quickly been upstaged by the posture taken by each candidate in the developing race.

It is, says Hooker, a confrontation between "forces of the future" (his organization) and "forces of the past" (Ellington's organization). Every Hooker speech is dotted with references to personal conversations with the late President. His mannerisms recall the Kennedy delivery. His basic theme "to get Tennessee moving" echoes the 1960 presidential campagin.

Hooker's identification with the Kennedys was underlined last week when E. William Henry resigned as Federal Communications Commissioner, a post to which he was appointed by President Kennedy, to return to Tennessee to aid the Hooker campaign.

In much the same way, Ellington has firmed up his Johnson image through his theory of the issues. He is bringing to the voters, he says, the "highest experience" and most of all "calmness."

Unlike his opponent, who sees "problems on every hand," Ellington says he finds only opportunities.

An avowed "old-fashioned segregationist" when he ran successfully in 1958, Ellington is now soft pedaling the race issue. He would not, he says, make such a statement today. Ellington has not pursued the matter further, perhaps because the largest Negro organization in the State formally endorsed Hooker's candidacy last week.

Like his friend in the White House, Ellington will have problems with the tax issue in the developing campaign. Admittedly his strongest issue in the 1958 race was his pledge not to raise taxes—a pledge he kept. With Tennessee facing a revenue crisis because of recent court rulings that have disrupted the entire system of property taxation in the state, the former Governcould make no such pledge yesterday.

His present position is that he will keep "a close watch over your taxes."

Most observers in Tennessee today believe that both candidates will lean more and more heavily on the issues that identify them with the Johnson or Kennedy philosophies: Hooker because he and his supporters believe the voters are ready for change after 14 years of the Ellington-Frank Clement administrations; Ellington because he and his supporters feel the calm, experienced, Southern image will win out in Tennessee.

Friend of Johnson to Face Kennedy Ally in Tennessee

Special to The New York Times

NASHVILLE, April 12 — Buford Ellington, former Governor of Tennessee and a close friend of President Johnson, announced today he would be a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Governor in the primary on Aug. 4.

Mr. Ellington was the second candidate to enter the race for the nnomination, which is normally equivalent to election. Three weeks ago John Jay Hooker Jr., a Nashville lawyer who is a close friend of Senator Robert F. Kennery of New York, announced his candidacy and since then has been campaigning.

Many political observers view the upcoming contest as a preinary test of strength between supporters of Mr. Johnson and Mr. Kennedy.

Associated Press

Buford Ellington

Mr. Ellington said he did not expect help from the President, but insinuated that "outsiders" were taking a hand in Mr. Hooker's campaign.

"I think the people of Tennessee are capable of making their own decision," he declared. "I am capable of making this race without any assistance from outside no matter who it may be. When I was Governor before, the people knew I was Governor in fact, and it will be that way again this time."

Mr. Ellington, who was elected in 1958 to a four-year term, declined to say whether he had written a letter to the President protesting the backing of Mr. Hooker by E. William Henry. Mr. Henry resigned last week as chairman of the Federal Communications Commission declaring that he intended to return to Tennessee to help Mr. Hooker, a 35-year-old lawyer who is making his first race for public office.

At the news conference at which he made his announcement, the 58-year-old Mr. Ellington was asked about his description of himself in 1958 as an "old-fashioned segregationist." What he meant then, he said, was that we should obey the laws as they existed at the time.

'Hearts Have Changed'

"I would not make that statement today because we have different laws," he continued. "The laws have changed and the hearts of men have changed."

He recalled that, at Mr. Johnson's request, he had toured the South to promote compliance with the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Mr. Ellington said he expected to build his own campaign organization, an indication he is trying to separate himself in the public's mind from the present Governor, Frank G. Clement. Mr. Clement is regarded as a prospective candidate for the United States senatorial nomination in the same Democratic primary, seeking the seat now held by Ross Bass. Mr. Clement is not permitted by state law to succeed himself as Governor.

Mr. Ellington said he had not talked with Mr. Clement since returning from Washington in February, following his resignation as director of the United States Office of Emergency Planning, a position in which he served for approximately a year.

FIGHTING MARS TALK BY LYND IN LONDON

LONDON, April 11 (AP)—Slogan-chanting and scuffles between anarchists and ban-the-bomb marchers at a Trafalgar Square rally today nearly drowned out a speech by Prof. Staughton Lynd of Yale University.

Mike Reynolds of New York, co-secretary of the War Resisters League, also spoke at the rally, which ended Britain's traditional Easter ban-the-bomb march. About 15,000 took part, including about 500 anarchists who waved a banner saying "The State is our Enemy" and chanted, "Anarchy, Anarchy."

Fighting broke out when the anarchists tried to force their way onto the speakers' platform.

One of the anarchists charged that the Easter march had become an ineffectual ritual and its participants a laughing stock.

Will Temper Tantrum Cost 'Big Mouth' Bass His Seat?

5/1/66

By JOE HATCHER

Staff Writer, The Nashville Tennessean
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

NASHVILLE, Tenn., April 30 — How deeply a single "temper tantrum" can influence a U.S. Senatorial race is a problem for U.S. Sen. Ross Bass of Tennessee.

The time and place of Sen. Bass' flare of temper is the important issue. It took place at the Democratic National Committee's banquet honoring the Democratic women leaders from all over the nation.

Although the flare was confined to Sen. Bass and one woman, it became a national story that gave all the indications of a public outburst before some 4,000 Democratic women. But not even his wife seated in the audience knew of the incident until later.

It started like this:

"He's known in the Senate as Big Mouth Bass,
"What's more he has a pretty lass,
"The Senator From Tennessee, Ross Bass—
"Avanell's husband."

Acknowledging the introduction, Bass says he turned to the woman who read the couplet, and remarked: "I am a senator. I am no bigmouth. I think I should leave. I am leaving."

Commenting on the event in a press conference in Nashville, Bass said: "I have always resented a slur on anyone's name, their looks, their color, their religion, their physical condition, or their position in life."

THE STORY, however, has invaded every nook and cranny of the state, and the big question arises as to how seriously the incident will handicap his race for re-election in both the primary and in the general, if he makes it.

Sen. Bass has no announced opposition, but there seems little doubt that Gov. Frank Clement will make the race again against the senator, who defeated him near 100,000 votes in 1964. Bass has not announced but has indicated he will make the formal entry later in May.

The Big Mouth Bass idea is a carry-over from Bass days in the House where he served with Perkins Bass of New Hampshire. One was known as Big Mouth and the other as Small Mouth, for the two well - known species of fish.

Sen. Bass laughed off the designation in those days, boasting that a big - mouth, a little-mouth, or a Ross Bass was a fighter from the word go.

PERHAPS HE has heard it too often. As a senator, he says he expects dignity and courtesy. Perkins Bass has since departed from Congress.

At the first test of how serious the incident was Bass won hands down, with the indorsement of the labor organization's COPE, which has approved him unanimously.

At the same COPE conference the past week, John J. Hooker Jr. of Nashville was also unanimously indorsed over Former - Gov. Buford Ellington. Labor supported Bass generally in 1964 against Gov. Clement. Sen. Bass also has received indorsement from the state's largest Negro political organization. However, the Knoxville chapter split off from the state committee and indorsed Gov. Clement for the Senate and Hooker for governor.

Three congressmen received labor's indorsement, Richard Fulton of Nashville, William Anderson, of Nautilus submarine fame, and George Grider of Memphis.

Gov. Clement has given no indication of when he will make his announcement for the Senate race.

New TVA Board Member Has Conservation History

5/15/66

By JOE HATCHER
Staff Writer, The Nashville Tennessean
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

TENNESSEE

NASHVILLE, Tenn., May 14 — TVA has a brand-new member of the three-man authority in Donald Opie McBride of Oklahoma.

The Valley leaders hoped for a member from the TVA region dedicated to the growth of TVA. McBride comes as a conservation expert, but has devoted study to TVA's power and transportation operations over the years of his experience.

He is married to the former Mary Lou Patterson of Tellico Plains which lies in the heart of the region, and has made many trips there and to the TVA projects in his water conservation and control projects.

McBride was the late Sen. Robert Kerr's executive assistant, and worked for years with the Senate public works committee. He helped Sen. Kerr write his book on "Land, Wood and Water." President Lyndon B. Johnson wrote the introduction to Sen. Kerr's book.

IN FACT the McBride career has been largely devoted to conservation and water resources development, not only in Oklahoma but in Nebraska, in Arkansas and the Red River Valley.

He points out that when he went to Washington, Oklahoma did not have a single federal project, and that it is now dotted with such developments. He worked at length on the development of the Arkansas, White and Red river valleys, based largely on the TVA system.

He went to Oklahoma in 1926 with an engineering firm specializing in water systems, and later chairmaned the Oklahoma Planning and Resources board.

Aubrey (Red) Wagner, chairman of the authority, is a career man with TVA and a power expert. Frank Smith is a former Alabama congressman, the third member.

TVA IS FACING a crossroads for expansion. Congress placed a limit on bonds TVA could issue for expanding its power facilities. This has largely been exhausted and the need has grown by leaps and bounds. Lifting the limitation will be asked in order that TVA may meet the demands.

In its last report, TVA listed an increase of $24.5 on power sales alone for the first nine months of the present fiscal year. The total power sales amounted to $246.8 million for the first nine months with a new record certain by June 30, 1966.

There's a growing sentiment in the area that TVA be assigned the Tombigbee project to connect the TVA region with the Gulf through the Mississippi and Alabama canal from the Tennessee to the Tombigbee and thence to the Gulf.

The biggest boost in the power sales came from the city of Memphis which turned its facilities for steam power over to TVA.

McBride's choice was that of President Johnson, with whom he was closely associated as senator and majority leader before he became President.

Rural Bloc Loses Ground In Ruling on Redistricting

5/22/66

By JOE HATCHER

Staff Writer, The Nashville Tennessean
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

NASHVILLE, Tenn., May 21 — Tennessee's rural bloc so long in control of the legislature lost still another diehard effort to hold that strength this week with the state supreme court's decision that the subdividing of urban counties in districts for Senate races was unconstitutional.

In meeting demands of the U.S. District court, the 1965 legislature reapportioned the state on a one-man-one-vote base, but subdivided the urban counties into districts in which the candidates must live and vote.

The federal court declined to overthrow the districting as not violating the U.S. Supreme Court ruling, but left the decision to the state courts on the basis of the state constitution.

TENNESSEE

A sentence in the constitution provides: "When a district is composed of two or more counties, they shall be adjoining; and no county shall be divided in forming a district."

THE RURAL bloc interpreted the sentence as applying only to districts with two or more counties. The urban forces contended the semicolon definitely applied the counties with more than one Senate seat. That the Supreme Court upheld in a 4-1 decision.

The decision was handed down with the avowed purpose of clarifying the situation before candidates for the legislature were required to qualify for the August primaries. Under the court's ruling, the Senate candidates in the four big counties will run at-large.

The court held in effect that subdividing would deny voters a full choice in electing senators who would necessarily represent the entire county rather than one particular division. The subdividing of the house districts was not contested since the state constitution said nothing on that subject.

THE HOPE of the rual bloc now is that a proposed constitutional amendment to be voted on this year will make constitutional the subdividing of both senate and house seats.

The rural bloc will decide whether to appeal the state court's decision to the U.S. Supreme Court for a final ruling.

The big question is whether the federal court might uphold the state court's ruling and nullify the chances of amending the constitution, and at least delay the effectiveness of the proposed amendment for reapportionment again in 1967.

THE RURAL bloc still has a slight edge in the membership in both houses, but a number of near-urban areas which might be affected could easily give the urban members a majority to prevent changes.

The rural bloc frankly admitted that subdividing would tend to weaken the urban bloc votes, and bring into the legislature a number of Negro members from the big urban areas. The one Negro House member from Shelby county supported the subdistricting in the 1965 reapportionment.

The net result is that the legal fight may yet continue for years, or until the urban areas grow into complete population control.

Foes Lined Up For Major Races

6/5/66

By JOE HATCHER
Staff Writer, The Nashville Tennessean
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

NASHVILLE, Tenn., June 4—Tennessee's 1966 political picture was virtually completed the past week with the U.S. Senate, the gubernatorial, and most of the congressional races now set up for the run for the roses.

Gov. Frank Clement was the last entry in the field, but there has never been much doubt about his ambition to try again for the U.S. Senate seat for which Sen. Ross Bass beat him in 1964.

Now it's Sen. Bass, who deferred his own announcement until the deadline approached, and Gov. Clement in a "return match." And ex-Gov. Buford Ellington and Nashville Attorney John J. Hooker Jr. seem to have the governor's race all to themselves.

TENNESSEE

THE REPUBLICANS appear concentrating on the congressional seats, including the congressional seats, including the U.S. Senate and at least six of the nine House seats.

Rep. W. E. Brock III of Chattanooga will seek reelection to his House seat, after having considered for a time the governor's race in November. The other two Republican congressmen, James Quillen in the First and John Duncan in the Second join with Brock in the solid Republican phalanx in East Tennessee.

But Republicans will seek the Fifth (Nashville), the Seventh (Jackson) and the Ninth (Memphis) seats as well. Republican candidates in the Seventh and Ninth districts pose a threat to the Democratic majority in the House delegation. The race against Rep. Richard Fulton of Nashville will be hotly contested but Fulton does not appear anywhere close to being threatened.

TWO YOUNG Republican attorneys, Kenneth Roberts of Nashville and Howard Baker Jr. of Knoxville are contesting the GOP senate nomination to face either Sen. Bass or Gov. Clement in November. Both have sound backgrounds in Republican ranks.

Roberts managed the Goldwater pre-convention and the November campaign. Baker opposed Sen. Bass in November, 1964, and got some 48 per cent of the vote, the biggest ever cast for a Republican candidate in the state. Either may draw strong Democratic support in November, whether opposing Bass or Clement.

All the issues are not clear-cut as yet between either the Democratic and/or the Republican candidates.

House Approves TVA Expansion

6/19/66

By JOE HATCHER
Staff Writer, The Nashville Tennessean
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

NASHVILLE, June 18—TVA was given approval last week by an overwhelming voice vote in the House to continue its greatest power expansion program—up to $1.75 billion in revenue bonds.

TENNESSEE

The Senate is expected to give strong approval.

The bonds are secured entirely by the agency's power revenues, which also will add additional mllions to the available expansion funds.

The TVA is now authorized to issue $750 million in revenue bonds, but the demands for power in the TVA area have increased, requiring the minimum of $1.75 billion by 1972, TVA officials told the Congress.

A total of $345 million in the revenue bonds have been issued, and another $155 million is needed to complete the present projects.

The agency is planning two more huge power plants, one to be completed in 1970 and another in 1971.

Present capacity is 17.1 million kilowatt hours with another 2.2 million kilowatt hours under construction.

Power use has increased about 1.5 million kilowatts yearly. Another two billion will be needed to meet demands in the next six or seven years. Power revenues will provide some $800 million, with the $1 billion increase in bonds needed for the completion.

REP. RICHARD FULTON, Nashville, was presiding over the House for the approval of the bond extension bill, and the margin was so overwhelming that no roll call was asked.

TVA only recently announced the payment "in lieu of taxes" of more than $10 million to the state and local agencies. The publicly owned distribution systems will add another $18 million "in lieu" for a total of some $23 million in cash to the various units of government in what are actually tax revenues.

TVA Chairman Aubrey Wagner sees no reduction of the demands for more and more power from the TVA system, with new and major industries coming into the state steadily.

The entire Tennessee delegation, including the three Republicans, endorsed the TVA bond expansion program. It will be handled in the Senate by the TVA area senators from Tennessee, Alabama and Mississippi.

Donald O. McBride of Oklahoma, federal conservation expert, took over his post as TVA commissioner on May 15. McBride, former executive aide to Sen. Robert Kerr, announced his support for expanding the TVA.

Arnold R. Jones, serving out his nine-year TVA term, will become a member of the business administration faculty at the University of South Florida at Tampa.

HEW CALLS FOR PROGRESS

The U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare is calling for significant progress in its efforts to desegregate public schools. Mr. Richard Fairley, from the Office of Education, outlined, at a workshop at Lane College, the steps of compliance that local school boards will follow if they expect to receive federal funds during the 1966-67 school year.

The one point Mr. Fairley continued to underscore was that the responsibility for desegrating schools rests with the school boards, and not with parents and children. He said that boards will be called upon to justify their choice of plans on the basis of "end results." By implication, he suggests that the Department has issued a single mandate: Schools must be integrated. The methodology is left to the discretion of school boards.

NAIRO SEEKS NASHVILLE CHAPTER

Frederick Routh, Executive Director of the National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials, met with a group of professional persons to discuss setting up a chapter of NAIRO in Nashville. The April 24th meeting with Mr. Routh revealed a need for professional association among intergroup relations workers, beyond the "casual and infrequent get-togethers." The chapter would be comprised of persons whose commitment and professional relations make them a vital resource to the community.

MEMPHIS FIELD OFFICE

On May 24, the members of the Tennessee Commission on Human Relations voted to open a field office in Memphis. It will be headed by Mr. Warren N. Moore, who has been assistant director of this Commission for the past seven months.

This office will accommodate Memphis and the West Tennessee counties, where 50% of the Negro population is concentrated. Mr. A. W. Willis, chairman of the Commission, said, "While there are racial problems throughout Tennessee, the concentration of Negroes in West Tennessee causes our staff to spend much of its time in that area." It was noted that a major portion of the complaints investigated come from this vicinity.

Southern Regional Council
Paul Anthony, Ex. Dir.
5 Forsyth St., N. W.
Atlanta, Ga. 30303

FROM THE DIRECTOR'S DESK:

Reports from every school system in Tennessee, compiled by the State Department of Education, show that in the 1965 school year fully 85%, or 150,000 of the 175,000 Negro students attend all-Negro schools, and 92% of the Negro teachers are on all-Negro faculties. This is eleven years after the Supreme Court held that segregated education is inconsistent with the Fundamental Law of our society, and two years after the Congress of the United States, by an overwhelming majority declared that integrated schools are necessary for the public welfare.

During this Spring period the school systems in Tennessee are preparing their desegregations plans for the 1966-67 school year.

Some citizens are asking, "Why should we continue to be concerned about integrated education?" They argue that most children have the right to attend the school of their choice and that we should not be interested in numbers, but simply the legal rights of the children.

We must continue to be concerned about integrated education, because racial isolation at the student or faculty level is harmful to children. Segregation impedes the ability of Negro children to learn. No one has stated this fact more clearly or more forcefully than the Supreme Court, in its landmark Brown Decision in 1954. The Kansas Court found that:

> "Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children...for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the Negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation ...therefore, has a tendency to retard the educational and mental development of Negro children."

Modern psychology teaches us that motivation is one of the main elements in the ability of children to learn. When Negro children are isolated according to race, they perceive the implication of their inferiority, though the schools may be academically equal. This form of statement, that the Negro children are inferior, reduces motivation to learn and therefore reduces their ability and their actual achievement.

Racial isolation is also harmful to white children. If separateness implies the inferiority of the Negro, it can impart to the white children the equally damaging suspicion of their superiority. In our pluralistic country and world, we do a severe injustice to our children if we do not develop in them at an early age, the ability to live and work with persons from different ethnic groups.

Faculty Integration

Educational integration is, at most, half complete if it includes only students. Bi-racial faculties and administrative staffs are necessary to achieve the full values of the program. White children must become accustomed to relating to Negroes in positions of authority. Negro children must see members of their group in responsible positions, so they can have life models to emulate.

Our office urges all Tennesseans to work for full integration in all the school systems of our state. We do not do this because the Federal Government requires it. It is Tennesseans who are hurt by segregated schools. It is Tennesseans who must work to eliminate this handicap with which so many children start their lives.

LABOR CONSULTS COMMISSIONS

A joint labor conference was convened in Chicago by UAW, USW, URW, UPW, and OCAW. The Tennessee Commission was among several state Fair Employment Practice and Civil Rights Commissions invited to attend and participate.

The International Union Officials indicated to the state commissions their willingness to bridge the gap between unions and civil rights agencies by setting up a jointly supervised conciliation procedure. The consensus of the represented commissions was that close relationships could be developed between unions and civil rights agencies, as long as the prerogative to act independently is not forfeited.

The two-day conference ended with the establishment of a Continuing Committee and a roughly drafted outline of Union-Commission co-operative action in the area of complaint disposition.

KNOXVILLE HUMAN RELATIONS COMMITTEE LAUNCHES PROGRAM

The Employment Sub-Committee of the Knoxville Human Relations Committee has mailed questionnaires to 270 of the largest private employers in Knoxville in an effort to determine accurately the facts about utilization of minority group manpower in the community. A cover letter from Mayor Leonard Rogers was attached to the questionnaires encouraging co-operation with the survey. Mr. D. A. Ward, a TVA employee, is chairman of the Sub-Committee.

The Knoxville Human Relations Committee is composed of 60 prominent citizens appointed by Mayor Rogers in late 1965. The committee has been divided into eight subcommittees which cover every area of community life, including education; employment; housing and public accommodations; public relations, research and publicity; youth and recreation; medical and health care facilities; law enforcement; and government and civic affairs.

An Executive Committee consists of the chairmen of each sub-committee. Mr. Hal Ernest, the Mayor's Public Relations Director, is chairman of the Executive Committee. Mr. Clifford Seeber, a local businessman, is serving as Secretary of the committee.

Mayor Wants Action

At the organizational meeting in February, Mayor Leonard Rogers told the body that he wants it to be an "action" group. "I want you to study the problems in human relations in Knoxville, to pinpoint where action is needed. You are to initiate necessary programs yourselves and to recommend to me and to other officials proper action."

The staff of the State Commission is working closely with the Knoxville Committee. Mark Israel, State Director, arranged for Mr. Fred Routh of the National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials, a national expert in human relations, to meet with the Executive Committee and Mayor Rogers in April to discuss program and functions of the Committee.

Committee to Lead to Commission

Mayor Rogers told the April meeting that he hoped that successful operation of the Committee would lead the way to establishment of an official commission by an ordinance similar to the one in Nashville.

The chairmen of the sub-committees are as follows:

Dr. John Page - Second Presbyterian Church - Education Committee
Rev. Frank Gordon - Shiloh Presbyterian Church - Gov. & Civic Affairs Committee
Dr. W. T. Crutcher - Mt. Olive Baptist Church - Public Relations, Research & Publicity Committee

August Primary Expected To Draw Record Voting

7/17/66

By JOE HATCHER
Staff Writer, the Nashville Tennessean
Special to Atlanta Journal-Constitution

NASHVILLE, Tenn. July 16 — Tennessee voters now promise to set all-time records for voting in August primaries in the gubernatorial and U.S. Senate races, both keeping apace in heat with the hot-dry weather ahead of schedule.

The record primary vote in a governor's race was 1962 with some 728,000 and in the U.S. Senate race of 1964 at 650,000.

The governor's race between ex-Gov. Buford Ellington and Nashville Attorney John J. Hooker, Jr. is almost certain to pass the 800,000 mark despite the fact that upwards of 100,000 Republicans who usually vote in the Democratic primary will be voting in their own U.S. Senate primary this year.

THE U.S. Senate races rarely attract the attention of the governor's races in the state. The race between Gov. Frank Clement and U.S. Sen. Ross Bass in 1964, for the unexpired term of the late Sen. Estes Kefauver, topped the 650,000 mark. It should do as well this year, although the interest is strictly secondary to the governor's race.

Lost behind these two major races are any local elections and primary races across the state for August 4.

TENNESSEE

In several counties the ballots will be the longest in history.

There is particular local interest in the new legislative races based on the 1965 reapportionment act which mathematically equalizes the representation for the first time in almost 100 years or more.

MANY OF the entrenched "professionals" in the legislature face entirely new constituencies and new opposition, although pitting the old regulars against each other was largely avoided so far as possible by the legislators.

Under the Tennessee system, the county general elections and the general elections for the judiciary are held simultaneously with the August primaries.

This further complicates the entire field to include the general and the two party primaries.

Knox County, for example, where there are full Republican and Democratic slates, will have the longest and most complicated ballot in history. The same situation exists in several other counties where the parties are somewhat equally powerful.

THE PARTY lever on the voting machines in machine-voting counties speeds up the general elections to some extent.

For the first time in history, the Republicans will have control of the election machinery in 37 counties, which resulted from Gov. Frank Clement's trade with the Republicans to elect him Senate speaker in 1965. This has encouraged Republican slates in these counties in particular.

The Republicans rarely hold statewide primaries, preferring to let the Democrats fight it out in August and then nominate candidates to oppose the nominees in November by convention.

BUT A SHOWDOWN battle over the U.S. Senate nomination forced a Republican primary this time. The Republicans anticipate at least a 300,000 primary vote in this race, at least half of which will be subtracted from the Democratic primary totals because of the cross-over voting particularly in Republican East Tennessee.

The bulk of this east state GOP vote in Democratic primaries usually go along with the incumbent Democratic administration where favor may be traded for GOP votes in primaries.

All in all, the situation creates a major interest in the Tennessee August elections.

Ellington and Baker Win, Clement Leads in Tennessee

AC 8/5/66

NASHVILLE, Tenn (AP) — Former Gov. Buford Ellington won the Democratic nomination for governor of Tennessee Thursday, and Howard H. Baker Jr. scored a landslide victory in the Republican Senate primary.

Ellington, 59-year-old political ally of President Lyndon B. Johnson and former director of the U. S. Office of Emergency Planning, defeated wealthy Nashville Attorney John J. Hooker Jr., 35, a friend of the Kennedy family.

But Sen. Ross Bass and Gov. Frank Clement, running neck-and-neck throughout the night, were locked in a tight battle for the Democratic nomination to the U. S. Senate.

With 1,950 of 2,741 precincts reporting, Ellington lead Hooker 273,625 to 227,133, and Clement was ahead of Bass 231,026 to 224,377.

In the Republican primary, Baker defeated Kenneth Roberts, Barry Goldwater's 1964 presidential campaign manager in Tennessee.

Baker was leading Roberts, 276,132 to 21,791, with 1,046 precincts reported.

When the returns from Tennessee's four largest counties began registering, Ellington's slim lead began to grow. Ellington lost all four counties when he was elected governor in 1958.

Hooker, who once served under Sen. Robert Kennedy in the Justice department, made a strong bid for labor and Negro support, but Ellington apparently cut into that vote.

At 11:02 (Atlanta time), Hooker conceded the race to Ellington and said: "I thought we were going to win. I don't know why we didn't win. But there'll be another day."

Hooker promised to support

Ellington and other Democrats in the November general election. The Republican have no candidate for governor, but could enter one later.

Baker, a moderate conservative who came close to a Senate victroy in 1964, led in each of Tennessee's nine congressional districts. He is a son-in-law of Sen. Everett Dirksen, R.-Ill.

Roberts pledged to support "my friend" in November and predicted Baker would win the Senate seat for the Republicans. It would be the first time in 97 years than Tennessee has sent a Republican to the Senate.

The Ellington-Hooker contest carried Johnson-Kennedy overtones. Ellington, a former adviser to President Johnson, promised "experienced and responsible leadership" in his bid for a second four-year term as governor. He held office in 1958-63.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 6,

TENNESSEE BLOC OF LIBERALS FAILS

Local Issues Also Cut Vote for Hooker and Bass

8/6/66

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

NASHVILLE, Aug. 5—The Democratic primary yesterday demonstrated that a combination of Negroes and white liberals is still not potent enough to assure the election of liberals in Tennessee, especially when local politics interfere.

John J. Hooker Jr. of Nashville, a liberal running for Governor, and Senator Ross Bass, a sponsor of the 1965 voting rights bill, who has one of the most liberal voting records in Congress, were assured of heavy support from both Negroes and labor.

Neither won. Mr. Hooker lost to a former Governor, Buford Ellington, and Senator Bass lost to Gov. Frank G. Clement.

One thing that hurt Senator Bass—some say it cost him the election—was the defection of thousands of Negro voters in the populous Negro wards of Memphis and Shelby County. He carried the Negro vote heavily elsewhere.

But in Memphis, Governor Clement cut into it deeply, carrying 20 predominantly Negro precincts and trailing close behind in 50 others.

A well-placed political appointment offers the most plausible explanation for this phenomenon. Last year Governor Clement appointed the Rev. Ben Hooks, a well known Negro leader, as a Criminal Court Judge in Memphis. He was the first Negro in modern Tennessee history to hold such a post.

The appointment was popular among the Negroes of Memphis and Shelby County, and many now credit it with swinging several thousand Negro votes. Negroes voted solidly against Governor Clement two years ago when he tried unsuccessfully to defeat Senator Bass for the Senate.

However, Negroes voted solidly for Mr. Hooker, an unbashed oponent of segregation. He received enough Negros support in Memphis to carry Shelby County by a slight margin, even though he had been expected to lose it to Mr. Ellington by several thousand votes.

One of Mr. Hooker's problems seemed to be the labor vote, which he thought was solidly for him. Most labor leaders worked for him, but many rank-and-file union members obviously voted for Mr. Ellington, despite Mr. Hooker's pledge to work for a state minimum wage law.

Three well-known labor precincts in Nashville that Mr. Hooker had expected to carry went solidly for Mr. Ellington.

The minimum wage issue may have backfired on Mr. Hooker. His opposition revealed during the campaign that he once had accepted a $20,000 lobbying fee to help defeat a Federal minimum wage bill for laundry and dry-cleaning workers.

Other factors undoubtedly helped defeat Senator Bass and Mr. Hooker.

For one thing, Senator Bass never quite lived down a political faux pas he made in Washington last spring. He walked out of a Democratic women's meeting in a huff after being referred to in a piece of program doggerel as "Big Mouth Bass."

The walkout was widely publicized in Tennessee. Governor Clement called attention to it obliquely in his advertising by pledging to bring dignity to the Senate position.

Mr. Hooker, to the surprise of most observers, lost his home county of Davidson (Nashville), 59,260 votes to 38,461. He had expected to carry it by a large majority.

Politicians here offered various explanations for the reversal, which was almost enough to make the difference between winning and losing the primary.

Republicans, who seemed to like the more conservative Mr. Ellington, passed up their own primary in large numbers in Davidson County and elsewhere to vote for the former Governor.

G. O. P. for Ellington

Mr. Ellington carried Mr. Hooker's home precinct in the posh, predominantly Republican Belle Meade community by 1,030 votes to 260. Only 86 persons voted in the Republican primary in that precinct, whereas, in a Presidential election, hundreds always vote for the Republican candidate.

Mr. Hooker also appeared to have been damaged by resentment against The Nashville Tennesseean, the morning newspaper here, according to politicians and other observers.

The Tennesseean promoted Mr. Hooker both in its news columns and on its editorial page, while the rival afternoon paper, The Nashville Banner, worked in the same manner for Mr. Ellington.

The resentment may have stemmed from The Tennessean's greater size—its circulation is one-third higher than The Banner—its success, influence and respectability.

The Tennessean had enjoyed notable success in promoting candidates in three local elections earlier this year, and there was considerable feeling that the paper in this primary was trying to extend its influence to the Capitol.

A small-business owner said today:

"People are tired of The Tennesseean trying to cram some politician down our throat."

There was a feeling that Mr. Hooker, who is 35 years old, might have alienated some older voters by his bold appeal to youth and by his open imitation of President Kennedy's style. He also mentioned in every speech that his wife, Tish, was pregnant with their third child.

Mr. Ellington, 59, said the state needed a mature, responsible Governor. He pointed ou that he had experience. He was Governor from 1959 to 1963. His campaign slogan was, "A man of his word."

It possibly was satisfying to President Johnson to see his old friend and hunting companion, Mr. Ellington, defeat Mr. Hooker, a friend of Senator Robert F. Kennedy of New York.

Hot Democratic Primary Contrasts With Cool GOP

8/21/66

By JOE HATCHER

Staff Writer, The Nashville Tennessean
Special to Atlanta Journal-Constitution

NASHVILLE, Tenn., Aug. 20—Whether the upsurge of Republican sentiment in Trennessee gained or lost in the August 4 primaries in Tennessee has become the biggest political puzzle of the era.

The Republican showing in the primaries was unquestionably weak, but somewhat by design. No ill feeling was engendered in the GOP senatorial primary which Knoxville's Howard Baker Jr. won almost 3 to 1 over Goldwaterite Ken Roberts of Nashville.

On the other hand, the Democratic primaries were not only embittered but downright vicious in both the senatorial and gubernatorial primaries.

Obviously many Republicans voted in the Democratic primary and held the balance of power that nominated both Gov. Frank Clement for the Senate and former-Gov. Buford Ellington for governor again.

BOTH DEFEATED candidates, John J. Hooker Jr. for governor and Sen. Ross Bass, have pledged support of the nominees in November but how far that will go to heal the wounds is highly problematical. Sen. Bass merely said he would give Gov. Clement the same support Clement gave him in 1964, That could mean much or little, however Bass analyzed the Clement backing when he almost lost to Baker in the November general election.

TENNESSEE

The rank and file followers of Hooker and Bass certainly didn't take the loss pleasantly by any means. It may take a lot of healing balm to assuage their feelings built up in the 14-year regime of the Clement-Ellington machine.

THE REPUBLICANS' leadership has apparently decided against making a strong fight, or any fight whatsoever, against Ellington, reasoning that many Democratic voters will not go to the polls in November without the drawing power of a governor's race. But elsewhere down the line, the Republicans are making a battle for congressional and legislative seats.

Outside the three east state Republican districts, the GOP will have congressional candidates in four other districts, with strong chances in only one of the Districts.

The Republicans hold eight Senate and 24 House seats, and will be contesting for 17 Senate and 64 House seats under the new reapportionment lines. Odds are they will add a number of House seats at least. These races will bring out Republican votes in many areas.

THE REAPPORTIONMENT act cut up the urban counties into house districts, and thereby embrace new districts that are dominantly Republican in the suburban silk-stocking areas.

One disappointment to Republicans is that Sen. Everett Dirksen has indicated he will not be able to come to East Tennessee and perhaps Memphis in the interest of his son-in-law, Baker. Sen. Dirksen says he will be undergoing another operation for his broken hip and will not participate in Republican campaigns. He might well have been of major strength in the Republican areas of the state, but his daughter may well portray his support of his son-in-law.

Baker polled some 48 per cent of the vote in November, 1964, to give Sen. Bass a close shave. If he can maintain that 500,000 vote total again, he might well be the first elected Republican senator since Reconstruction.

Aroused Miami Area Asks Crime-Corruption Probe

MIAMI, Fla., Sept. 10—Citizen groups in South Florida are urging U.S. Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenbach to investigate organized crime and corruption in this area.

Pleas to the attorney geseral went out from the Greater Miami Crime Commission and the Palm Beach County Citizens Crime Committee.

James O. McGown, president of the Miami Crime Commission, told Katzenbach that local grand juries have listed widespread vice activity and witnesses have testified as to corruption of law enforcement officials.

Joseph J. Heine, of Lake Worth, head of the Palm Beach County crime group, in a wire to Katzenbach, declared "nothing short of a federal grand jury action can stop the corruption . . . the rot (and) the intimidations incurred in Palm Beach County."

A RECENT series of events have aroused south Florida over its crime picture like nothing since the Kefauver Crime Committee hearings of the 1950s when multi-million-dollar bookie crime syndicates were uncovered.

These included statements over TV in Miami of a confessed, retired "bag" man that he had paid off personnel of high law enforcement agencies, and the disclosure over a Miami radio station of supposedly "secret" testimony before a grand jury.

Editor Bill Baggs of the Miami News said that "every cop in the county (Dade) has a little black cloud over his head."

BAGGS URGED the same application to "this mess here in 1966" as was used by the late Sen. Estes Kefauver in the 1950s—a probe by a committee of the U.S. Senate.

The Miami Hearld observed that Dade County (Miami) was a "cesspool of crime." The paper said some of the nation's most notorious hoodlums make their home in Dade "secure from the heat of police surveillance. Expert jewel thieves hit Miami on a schedule that would make any airline proud."

Miami Beach socialite Phoebe Morse said the other day she is giving up on the city and buying a home in Palm Beach. Mrs. Morse, the wife of a wealthy New York banker said she had been robbed in Miami Beach four times in the past 15 years.

GOV. HAYDON BURNS, asked to supply an outside state attorney for Dade County to work with the grand jury, refused, charging politics was involved.

The charges of crime and corruption have spilled over into several of the November general election races.

Meeting with 37 of the state's 67 sheriffs, Robert King High, the Democratic gubernatorial nominee, said he realized there "is a crisis of crime in this state," and promised, if elected, the sheriffs would have his "encouragement and blessing."

Claude Kirk, GOP nominee for governor, said Miami's high crime rate was the result of "listless and purposeless leadership." He was hitting at High, mayor of Miami.

2 Tennessee Senate Candidates Woo Negro Vote

By ROY REED
Special to The New York Times

NASHVILLE, Tenn., Oct. 2—Probably no Tennessee voters raised their eyebrows on learning that Gov. Frank G. Clement, the Democratic nominee for the United States Senate, had appeared before a group of Negro leaders here yesterday asking for their support.

But many must have been startled to find that his Republican opponent, Howard H. Baker Jr., had been there too, speaking just as enthusiastically of Negro rights and pleading just as earnestly for Negro votes.

When the Democrat admitted to the hosts, "I need your support," the Republican declared, every bit as forthrightly, "I want your help."

Governor Clement finally got the endorsement of the group, the Tennessee Voters Council, the most influential of the political organizations representing the state's 16 per cent Negro voting bloc.

But he got it only after seven hours of bitter debate, and the divided vote indicated that the Democrats, for a change, will not be able to take the Negro vote for granted in this November's general election.

Mr. Baker's appearance before the Voters Council was unusual for a Republican. It is part of a strong effort by the Tennessee Republican party, particularly its liberal wing, to win back the Negroes who were virtually drummed out of the party in this state during the Goldwater period.

State and national Republican officials are spending a good deal of time this fall trying to persuade Tennessee Negroes that the Republican party is not a racist party.

The Republicans hope to entice enough Negroes and exploit enough sentiment against inflation and President Johnson to make substantial gains in Tennessee this fall.

Besides campaigning for Mr. Baker, a boyish, 40-year-old Knoxville lawyer, they are working hard to add two Congressional seats in traditionally Democratic western Tennessee to the three they already have in traditionally Republican eastern Tennessee.

Gov. Frank G. Clement

Associated Press

Howard H. Baker Jr.

All the Republicans are underdogs, but at least one House candidate is given a fair chance of winning.

With neither party making a move to stir it, the race issue, thus far, has been almost entirely absent from this fall's campaign. Democrats and Republicans are campaigning as if they had never heard of Lester G. Maddox, the pistol-waving segregationist who last Wednesday took the Democratic nomination for Governor in neighboring Georgia.

In spite of this, some observers believe that a fairly strong segregationist sentiment still exists in Tennessee, especially in the western section that borders Mississippi, and that it will benefit the candidates who strike the more conservative posture.

That seemed to be true in the Democratic primary in August. Former Gov. Buford Ellington, a racial moderate, defeated his somewhat more liberal opponent, John Jay Hooker Jr. Governor Clement unseated Senator Ross Bass, who has a more liberal reputation than Mr. Clement.

Both Governor Clement and Mr. Baker seemed to be anxious not to repeat Mr. Hooker's mistake of wooing the Negro vote more eagerly than his opponent. Both men displeased the Negro leaders yesterday by refusing to take a stand for open housing.

Mr. Baker may attract some conservative support because of his father-in-law, the Senate minority leader, Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois. Senaor Dirksen's opposition to the open housing section of the 1966 civil rights bill is well-kown to the Negroes here, and presumably among the whites, as well. He may visit Tennessee and campaign for Mr. Baker, who is the son of a former Tennessee Congressman.

Unlike some of his Republican colleagues, Mr. Baker may have difficulty tying his opponent to President Johnson. Governor Clement has stayed at arm's length from the President and in the primary campaign he denounced Senator Bass as a "rubber stamp" for Mr. Johnson.

It is reported that the President will visit Tennessee before the election. A few Democrats, like Representative George W. Grider of Memphis, who has voted with the President consistently, are eager to have him. But others are said to be hoping that he will not come.

Nixon Has Stumped State

The Republicans are unhesitatingly bringing their big-name speakers. Former Vice President Richard M. Nixon toured the state a few days ago for Republican candidates. Others are expected to follow.

Mr. Grider is opposed by Dan H. Kuykendall, a former Memphis soap salesman who is running hard against President Johnson and the great society.

Mr. Kuykendall has developed a gimmick for calling attention to inflation. He carries a basket of groceries onto the speaker's platform and hoists each item into the air, quoting its price before the Johnson Administration and its price now.

In the races for House seats, the Republicans are concentrating on trying to elect Mr. Kuykendall and Julius Hurst. Mr. Hurst appears to be their best hope. He is the nominee for the seat now held by Representative Tom Murray, a conservative west Tennessee Democrat who was defeated in the primary by a young state Representative, Ray Blanton. Mr. Hurst opposed Representative Murray in 1964 and almost unseated him.

Mr. Kuykendall and Mr. Hurst are more conservative than Mr. Baker. However, they too, are making some effort to get Negro votes.

Ghost of Goldwater Image Rises to Haunt Republicans

By JOE HATCHER
Staff Writer, the Nashville Tennessean
Special of The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

TENNESSEE

NASHVILLE, Tenn., April 2 — The ghost of the Goldwater image is arising again to haunt the efforts of the Republican party in Tennessee to grow into a two-party factor in the state.

While the state GOP executive committee met in Memphis to move toward the new image of "progressive Republicanism," the Republicans in the state capital were falling under the domination of the John Birch Society with a new Goldwater-type county organization.

Quietly and unexpectedly, the extreme rightists in Nashville moved into the county convention with an entirely new candidate and sufficient votes to overturn Chairman Charles Anderson, an offi[illegible] of the Life and Casualty [illegible]surance Co. Two other elected officials of the organization quickly withdrew themselves as candidates for reelection, charging the John Birchers had completely taken over the committee.

AT THE MEMPHIS committee meeting, State Chairman Julius Hurst of McNairy county, the first West Tennesseans ever to hold the GOP post, resigned presumably to run for Congress in the Seventh District. Ernest Koella, manufacturer of Maryville, Tenn., was unanimously elected chairman to return the control of the Old Line Republican leadership in East Tennessee.

Koella is considered a moderate, and has been allied with the late U.S. Rep. Howard Baker in the Knoxville area. Baker's son is a candidate for the Republican nomination to the U.S. Senate.

Nashville Attorney Kenneth Roberts, who managed the Goldwater fiasco in the state, is opposing Baker for the nomination, and the Birchite takeover in Davidson county is expected to strengthen Roberts in his home town so far as the county organization is concerned.

HOWEVER, the takeover in the Nashville committee, so like the Goldwater takeover in the state in 1964, may well further alienate the old line Republicans in the capital in favor of young Howard Baker's moderation.

The Republican state committee abandoned the idea of perhaps avoiding a state primary in favor of a convention indorsement in the senate primary, and in other contested races above the county level.

Thus it appears Baker and Roberts will go to the polls in the senate race. Likewise, Hurst has now drawn opposition for the congressional race from a Memphis State University professor who will seek the big Shelby county Republican vote.

THE REPUBLICANS will hold a state convention in Nashville June 2-4 to nominate candidates for the state supreme and appeals courts, and probably indorse a candidate for governor if there are no entries in the governor's race before that time which will force a primary.

U.S. Rep. W. E. Brock III of Chattanooga is the favorite of Republican leaders to make the bid for the governor's race — if he can be persuaded to leave the comparatively safe congressional seat. Brock did not close the gate on his becoming the candidate for governor while attending the Memphis conference.

Races Held Uncommunicative

By W. A. REED JR.
Religion News Editor

IT IS TIME for us to get out of our shells for time is running out, the executive director of the Tennessee Council on Human Relations said last week.

Baxton Bryant, speaking at the first meeting of the Nashville chapter of the Religious Public Relations Council, Inc., urged members of that group to "tie their convictions about human betterment to warm-hearted theology" and help in race relations.

He said there was more talk between races today than ever before but less real communication. Bryant warned that there was a danger of retrogression rather than progress.

"We had better get acquainted with our neighbors," he urged.

Bryant pointed out that, in days of civil rights compliance, the Edgehill area, in South Nashville, was an encircled one in which there was little chance for integration. He called the Oak Ridge neighborhood of Scarborough, the most segregated community in the state.

He pointed out that integration movements led by Negroes that were once moving at a pace of five miles an hour are now running at 100 miles an hour. The director said many whites do not realize that what a Negro may say to a white is not exactly what is going on in the community.

"We had better get out of our shells of self-conceit for time is running out," said Bryant.

He described the Tennessee Human Relations Council as an organization that served as a rallying place for persons who strive for intelligence, tolerance and fair play in race relations.

"We seek to foster an environment in which citizens may live together in decency and dignity free from discriminatory practices," Bryant said.

Bryant pointed out that real concern for persons of other ethnic groups and the poor was an expression of persons validating what they really believe is the mission of the church.

"Jesus told us to free the captives, console the broken-hearted and help the poor," Bryant told the council members.

National Issues Loom Large In Baker-Clement Showdown

By JOE HATCHER
Staff Writer, the Nashville Tennessean
Special to Atlanta Journal-Constitution

NASHVILLE, Tenn. Sept. 3. Tennessee's U.S. Senate race on Nov. 8 is rapidly becoming a backdrop for the national inter-party fight for the shift in congressional strength and the 1968 presidential contest.

Howard Baker Jr., son-in-law of Sen. Everett Dirksen, is spending more time in Washington lining up Republican support than in Tennessee thus far.

The contest between Baker and Gov. Frank Clement, the new Democratic nominee, is heading for a showdown on national rather than state issues, with the party banners and issues the major factors.

Gov. Clement has started his active campaigning far earlier than usual for the November battle, confining his efforts to the homefolks rather than a bid for national party support, however.

BAKER HAS already enlisted Richard M. Nixon for the campaign in Tennessee, with the likelihood that his father - in - law will defer his surgical plans until after at least some campaign efforts in the state. Sen. Truston Morton of Kentucky, as chairman of the GOP senate campaign committee, is also expected to give both financial and personal aid to the Tennessee campaign.

TENNESSEE

On the other hand, Gov. Clement is handicapped when it comes to soliciting high-level Democratic aid in the state. The big question is what the national Democratic figures can do for his cause in the state. Obviously he cannot invite the Deep South senators into the campaign, since Tennessee has not participated with them in the civil rights fights. Gov. Clement will depend on the state's heavy Negro and labor vote as the balance of power in the state's voting. Likewise it's doubtful that Vice - President Hubert Humphrey would be of benefit among the state's more conservative Democratic voters. Nor would a number of other Democratic leaders in the senate. More valuable will be the Democratic leaders in the senate. More valuable will be the Democratic congressmen in the state with only two of the six having serious November opposition.

BAKER, along with two Republican congressional nominees, is basing early efforts on criticisms of the national administration and attacking President Johnson's foreign and domestic policies.

Dan Kuykendall of Memphis, who unsuccessfully opposed Sen. Albert Gore in 1964, is challenging U.S. Rep. George Grider in Memphis, and sounding the Republican battle cry to start his campaign. He is blaming the Johnson administration for laxity in supplies for Viet Nam, with advocating repeal of the right-to-work laws, the war on poverty, and the Great Society, and the inflationary action of the federal administration. Julius Hurst in the Seventh district has indicated similar programming, and so has Howard Baker.

Gov. Clement must follow Democratic lines to a large extent. He must necessarily court the more liberal followers of Sen. Ross Bass, whom he narrowly defeated — nearer 20,000 in the final tally of votes in the August primaries. Bass and Clement did not differ basically in the August campaign, making it rather a battle of personalities than basic issues. Clement will have the support or the influence of an incumbent governor with state-wide organization and state favors to grant before he is to leave the office.

The campaign could develop into a fullscale national contest.

BLACK KEEPS BAN ON TEXAS POLL TAX

Heartened Liberals to Push Big Drive for Voters

By MARTIN WALDRON
Special to The New York Times

AUSTIN, Tex., Feb. 23—Justice Hugo L. Black ruled today in Washington to allow a court-ordered suspension of the Texas poll tax to stand, a decision that could have a decisive effect on Texas elections this year.

A top Texas labor leader said labor groups in the state would try to register an additional one million "liberal" voters during a special 15-day registration period ordered this week by the State Legislature. About 375,000 of the state's two million voters now are considered liberal.

"We have been on the telephone all day, organizing our people in the major population areas," said Roy Evans, secretary-treasurer of the Texas American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations. He said the Texas A.F.L.-C.I.O. would concentrate its efforts in "labor and minority group precincts."

Senate Race This Year

Texas will elect a Senator and 23 Representatives in addition to a Governor and a reapportioned Legislature this year. A majority of Texans lives in the eastern part of the state where labor is strongest.

A three-judge Federal Court ruled on Feb. 9 that the Texas poll tax was unconstitutional, but Texas Attorney General Waggoner Carr has appealed the decision. A group of Austin Republicans had asked Justice Black to suspend the three-judge court ruling pending this appeal. In Washington today, Justice Black declined without comment to do so.

In anticipation of Justice Black's action, the State Legislature, in its special session, which ended yesterday, passed a law providing a 15-day period in March for registration of adults who did not pay their 1966 poll taxes by the Jan. 31 deadline. The voters registered during this 15-day period could not have voted this year if Justice Black had stayed the three-judge ruling pending its appeal.

Texas to Press Plea

About two million people are estimated to have paid their poll taxes before the Jan. 31 deadline. Mr. Evans said another 4-million adults did not but now become eligible to vote if they can be registered.

Gov. John Connally, who is running for re-election and generally is not supported by labor, said the state would push its appeal of the court ruling outlawing the poll tax.

In addition to providing for the special 15-day registration period, the Legislature yesterday passed an annual voter registration plan advocated by Governor Connally. Under it, Texans would have to register by Jan. 31 of each year to vote in that year's election.

The Governor called it "an honest, fair and responsible bill calculated to encourage the right to vote."

Many liberal legislators assailed the plan as being designed to keep the number of voters down.

TEXAS LABOR SET TO BACK LIBERALS

Hopes to Influence Change in State Democratic Party

Special to The New York Times

HOUSTON, Feb. 26—Texas labor, which hopes to turn the Texas Democratic party from a conservative to a liberal bent, will try to raise $100,000 additional next week to use for favored political candidates this year.

Texas COPE, the Committee on Political Education, will meet here Thursday, Friday and Saturday to vote on a recommendation that the political dues of about 200,000 Texas union members be raised from 5 cents to 10 cents a month for the remainder of the year.

Roy Evans, secretary-treasurer of the Texas Council of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, said the COPE convention might also endorse some candidates.

The Texas labor endorsement has sometimes been viewed as a liability in a state where only 13 per cent of the labor force belongs to a union.

One union local president recently said in a county COPE meeting called to endorse legislative candidates:

"Let's face it, the best thing we could do for our friends is to endorse their opponents."

But Mr. Evans, who coordinates statewide political activity for the union from his Austin headquarters, said Texas labor carried the state for the Kennedy-Johnson ticket in 1960 by getting out the vote for the Democrats. The Kennedy-Johnson ticket got 1,167,000 votes to 1,121,000 for Richard M. Nixon and Henry Cabot Lodge.

Texas labor has swung whatever power it posseses behind Mr. Johnson since his election to the Senate in 1948, Mr. Evans said. In 1948, the C.I.O. endorsed Mr. Johnson while the A. F. of L. endorsed his opponent in the primary, Coke Stevenson, a former Texas Governor. Mr. Johnson won by 87 votes.

In addition to raising $100,000 additional for political purposes, Texas labor officials will take advantage of an antipoll tax ruling to begin a voter registration drive March 3.

The drive will be concentrated in east Texas, where the major portion of the state's 10 million persons live.

Poll Tax Wiped Out

A three-judge Federal Court struck down the Texas poll tax last Feb. 9, and Justice Hugo L. Black refused to suspend the ruling pending its appeal. The State Legislature provided in a special session this week for a 15-day period to register those who did not pay their poll taxes or file for a poll tax exemption before the Jan. 31 deadline.

Mr. Evans predicted that one million more voters, most of them liberals, could be registered. State officials estimated 100,000.

The COPE convention will probably endorse a candidate in the Democratic primary for Governor, Mr. Evans said. Gov. John B. Connally is being opposed for nomination to a third term by Stanley Woods, a Houston oilman. Mr. Woods is expected to get the labor recommendation.

There may be no endorsement in the United States Senate race. The main national goal for Texas labor has been repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, the section that allows states to outlaw compulsory union membership. Texas is one of 19 states that has such a law.

Senator John G. Tower, the Republican who succeeded President Johnson in the Senate, is a bitter opponent of the repeal of 14(b). His chief Democratic opponent this year, State Attorney General Waggoner Carr, said he considered it a state issue.

Texas union members, normally Democrats, may be urged to support an independent, Ronnie Dugger of Austin, for Senator to register disapproval of the conservative Texas trend of the state Democratic party. Mr. Dugger, a liberal, is editor of The Texas Observer, a bimonthly magazine.

Two Democratic candidates for Congress have been endorsed by labor, State Representative Robert Eckhardt and William Kilgarlin, former chairman of the Houston Democratic party.

CONNALLY ASSAILS KATZENBACH EDICT

Order to Monitor Registration Angers Texas Governor

Special to The New York Times

AUSTIN, Tex., March 2—Gov. John B. Connally of Texas today denounced as a "great disservice to the people of Texas" a Department of Justice order that the Federal Bureau of Investigation monitor a special registration of voters that opens tomorrow.

"I can ony interpret this to mean that for whatever reason the Department of Justice and the United States Attorney General, who I presume ordered it, intends to instigate trouble in this state where we've had none," Governor Connally said. Waggoner Carr, a Democratic primary candidate for the United States Senate seat held by John G. Tower, Republican, told reporters earlier in the day that he was "fighting mad" over the order.

Writes Katzenbach

Mr. Carr wrote United States Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach:

"Quite frankly, we feel our state is capable of handling our internal affairs. Our reports will be made to the Federal court having jurisdiction over this matter and to no one else unless the court directs us to do it.

"Your assignment of the F.B.I. to maintain surveillance over the Texas government is an insult to every public official and every citizen of Texas. No citizen of Texas, any more than any citizen of any other proud state, will cower under such misuse of authority. If you have any complaint against Texas, state it in court, don't threaten with the F.B.I.

"Texas will cooperate with you in every reasonable way in this or any other matter, but we will not subject this state to humiliation resulting from an 'overlord' attitude."

Governor Agrees

Governor Connally, at a hastily called afternoon news conference, backed up Mr. Carr's angry words with some of his own. "I'm not privy to all that went on," he said, "but I approve [of Mr. Carr's statement]."

The Governor declared that the Department of Justice action "puts a great service, the F.B.I., in a very difficult position."

The registration period was ordered by the Texas Legislature last week in a special session, called after a Federal court held the Texas poll tax unconstitutional.

From March 3 to March 18, those who fail to pay their poll taxes will be allowed to register free, by mail or at county tax collectors' offices or at deputy registrars' offices set up at stores or public buildings.

Justice Hugo L. Black of the Supreme Court refused to stay the three-judge court's decree pending appeal to the Supreme Court by the State of Texas.

Mr. Carr then went back to the three judges in Houston Saturday and got a stay of judgment for 30 days, to allow the special registration and preparation of lists of qualified voters ahead of regular municipal and school elections the first week in April and the party primaries May 7.

Governor Connally recalled he had recommended abolition of the poll tax and the Legislature submitted it to the voters in 1963. Repeal was rejected by Texans, he recalled, but he again recommended abolishment in 1965 and repeal will be on the ballot this fall.

Katzenbach 'Astonished'

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 2—Attorney General Katzenbach said he had talked to Mr. Carr by telephone before his news conference and was "astonished that he would express such views."

Makes Angriest Attack Yet on Justice Department

4/3/66

By MARTIN WALDRON

Special to The New York Times

AUSTIN, Tex., April 2—Gov. John B. Connally Jr. this week issued his bitterest attack so far on the national Administration since his "split" with President Johnson about a month ago.

The Governor, who has refrained from attacking the President directly, accused the Justice Department of "either frivolous harassment or an attempt to take over the authority of the state government."

Mr. Connally was speaking of a Justice Department suit to require Texas to give adults another chance to register as voters before the May 7 Democratic and Republican primaries. The suit was filed in Austin Wednesday night.

Political observers have viewed the attacks by Governor Connally as serving two purposes.

A Spark for Conservatives

According to this view, the attacks, first, have kept alive the determination of conservative Democrats, who are led by Governor Connally, to maintain control of the state Democratic party and thus control the Texas delegation to the 1968 national Democratic convention

Second, the attacks are said to give a possible campaign issue to the Democratic State Attorney General, Waggoner Carr, in his race against the Republican Senator, John G. Tower, this fall. Mr. Carr has joined Governor Connally in the attacks on the national Administration for the last four weeks.

Most of their criticism has been directed at the Justice Department because of its activity in getting voters registered in Texas.

In a special 15-day registration period ended 10 days ago, 635,000 additional voters registered after a three-judge Federal Court abolished the Texas poll tax as a prerequisite for voting.

Katzenbach Is Target

When the Justice Department ordered Federal Bureau of Investigation agents to monitor the registration period, Governor Connally and Mr. Carr began daily attacks against United States Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach.

And the Governor told a group of reporters in an off-the-record news conference that a political rift had developed between him and President Johnson after 15 years of close association.

The Governor said the Presi-

And the Governor told a group of reporters in an off-the-record news conference that a political rift had developed between him and President Johnson after 15 years of close association.

The Governor said the President had not been consulting him in making Federal appointments in Texas. And Mr. Connally added that the President was getting "bad advice from Eastern liberals."

Mr. Carr generally has adopted the same viewpoint.

Many Texas political figures say that the Governor's attack on the national Administration is part of Mr. Connally's continuing feud with United States Senator Ralph W. Yarborough, a liberal, over who will head the Texas Democratic party.

Texas liberal Democrats have started a campaign to try to capture the state Democratic party this year with an eye toward changing the strongly conservative viewpoint the state

Kennedy an Issue

There is a feeling in Texas that if liberals do get in control of the state party, Senator Robert F. Kennedy of New York will have considerable influence in the Texas delegation in the 1968 National Democratic Convention.

National convention delegates will be elected at a state convention of county Democratic officials.

Both the liberals and the conservatives are striving to get control of the state party by winning precinct seats. Precinct elections will be held on the evening of May 7.

"The Governor wants to keep control of the state party to prevent Bobby Kennedy from having any influence in 1968 in Texas," said a long-time Texas politician. "Fussing at the Federal Government makes a good campaign issue."

Mr. Carr has also been getting considerable political advantage out of attacking the Administration, even though President Johnson had given the appearance of having endorsed Mr. Carr for the Senate seat.

Although Senator Tower also denounced the F.B.I. monitoring of voter registration last month, he was not as vigorous or as repetitious as Mr. Carr in doing so.

In the suit that provoked the newest attack on the national Administration by Governor Connally and Mr. Carr, the Justice Department said more than two million adult Texans still had not registered to vote and that more time was needed.

The Justice Department asked the three-judge Federal court to open up the registration books for a two-week period before the May 7 primary, and a two-week period preceding this fall's general election.

Three Federal judges will hear the suit at 10 A.M. Tuesday in Austin.

Liberals Bolt State Parley —May Support Tower

9/21/66

By MARTIN WALDRON

Special to The New York Times

AUSTIN, Tex., Sept. 20 — About 850 liberal delegates bolted the Texas State Democratic convention today and threatened to endorse Republican Senator John G. Tower, a Barry Goldwater supporter, for re-election in November.

The liberals, most of them from Houston, marched from the Austin City Auditorium to the State Capitol where they heard speeches attacking Gov John B. Connally Jr., and other state Democratic leaders.

The liberal delegates are believed to represent about 15 per cent of the 3 million registered voters in Texas.

Governor Connally, a conservative, and his supporters were in control of the state convention that was honoring Attorney General Waggoner Carr, the Democratic nominee for Senator.

"To hell with John Connally and his whole bunch," shouted Mrs. David Hill, one of the Houston delegates. Mrs. Hill stood on an automobile and urged liberal delegates to boycott the convention.

The Houston delegates, joined by about 40 from elsewhere in the state, then began their march through downtown Austin. They carried signs that said: "Liberals will not deal" and "Don't trade in a Tower for John's used Carr."

The open split between liberal and conservative Democrats in Texas, which has threatened for several months, was viewed as a significant gain for Senator Tower, who was elected to succeed President Johnson in 1961 by a combination of liberal Democrats and Republicans.

For several years liberal leaders in Texas have advocated support of Republicans as a protest against conservative domination of the Texas Democratic party.

Senator Tower also has drawn the tacit endorsment of organized labor in Texas this year despite his opposition to repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which allows states to outlaw union shop contracts.

Last night the liberal delegates refused to attend a $25-a-plate dinner honoring Mr. Carr. They organized a rival dinner and dance and pledged to send the proceeds to a relief fund of striking farm workers in south Texas.

The walkout began when the State Executive Committee ruled that half of Houston's eight seats could be filled by conservative Democrats. Liberal candidates defeated conservatives in Houston precinct elections on May 14, but the election was challenged at the convention.

The Republican State Convention, also held today at San Antonio, 75 miles from Austin, turned into a campaign rally for Senator Tower who delivered the major speech.

The 2,220 Republican delegates gave Senator Tower a 20-minute ovation as he attacked Mr. Carr, contending he was "unqualified" to be a United States Senator.

Tower Assails Carr

Senator Tower, who asserts that he is President Johnson's top target in the November elections, said Mr. Carr would not be allowed to exercise any independent judgment if he should be elected.

"If I am re-elected, I will oppose the Administration when I think its actions are not in the best interest of the American people," Senator Tower pledged. "On the other hand, when I agree with the Administration, I will give it vigorous support."

Senator Tower said he was "wholeheartedly" behind President Johnson's policy on the war in Vietnam.

While the liberal delegates who walked out were marching toward the State Capitol, Governor Connally was delivering the keynote speech to 5,300 other Democratic delegates. The major portion of his speech was devoted to urging the need for a new State Constitution.

Governor Connally, President Johnson and two former Texas governors endorsed Mr. Carr's candidacy last night at the dinner, which was attended by about 3,500 persons.

Mr. Johnson said in a telesram that he would vote for Mr. Carr "because I think he will make a good Senator."

In an apparent answer to Republican charges that Mr. Carr would vote as the President told him to if elected, Mr. Johnson said he believed that the Democratic nominee "would listen to all voices and then vote as his conscience told him to."

Price Daniel former governor and former Senator, and Allan Shivers, former governor, helped introduce Mr. Carr at the dinner.

Mr. Shivers was governor of Texas when the State Democratic Party endorsed Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower for President in 1952.

After the walkout, the remaining delegates at the State Democratic Convention adopted a proposal to put four liberals and four conservatives from Houston on the State Executive Committee.

The Democrats and the Republicans meeting in San Antonio both endorsed proposals to give special attention to the plight of South Texas farm workers who ended a 400-mile march from the Rio Grande River to the State Capitol on Labor Day.

The farm workers, most of them Mexican-Americans, had asked for a $1.25-an-hour state minimum wage.

State Taxes Are Ruled Out for Rights Council

AC 9/27/66

A Fulton Superior Court jury has ruled that the Southern Regional Council (SRC) is a charitable organization and not subject to state taxation.

The jury deliberated more than three hours before finding in favor of the SRC. The State Labor department was attempting to collect unemployment compensation taxes from the civil rights group.

The labor department attempted to show that the SRC was not covered by the statute which exempts certain organizations from payment of taxes.

Although the verdict only concerned unemployment compensation, it could go much further and end any debate over other taxes.

The state, on June 24, issued a fi fa against the SRC and placed a levy against five typewriters owned by the organization. The labor department contended that the council owed a total of $17,993.17, including penalities and interest.

As a result of the issuance of the fi fa, the SRC posted a $25,000 bond with the Fulton County sheriff's department and challeneged the labor department in court.

The state contended in court that the SRC had violated the statute allowing certain organizations to be tax exempt by "attempting to influence legislation."

To this allegation, the SRC said:

"It (SRC) maintains a regional council for the improvement of economic, civic and racial conditions in the South, endeavoring to promote a greater unity in the South towards regional and racial development."

Dear Dr. Witherspoon:

Both our executive director and I have read with great interest your letter of July 25. Your group appears to be an excellent one, and it is gratifying to us to know of its existence and of the work you have described.

First, let me make it clear that the Southern Regional Council is not a foundation. We are ourselves an agency which works by means of research, education and programs of action for equal opportunities for all peoples of the South. We depend on foundations for our funding. Our Board of Directors is composed of one hundred people from all over the South. One of them incidentally, is Mr. H. A. Brown of Austin, who is President of the Texas AFL-CIO.

We do provide assistance to human relations councils throughout the South in two ways: through state councils on human relations, and through program help in connection with SRC's special projects.

We helped to found state councils on human relations, autonomous voluntary associations, in all southern states and have continued to work cooperatively with them and their local chapters for about twelve years.

Our assistance to them includes a grant-in-aid program. Through these councils and their staffs we give aid to local councils affiliated with them. Unfortunately, a council started in Texas about ten years ago was defeated largely, I think, by the size of the state. Since then we have maintained a working relationship only with the Houston Council on Human Relations. This group began with a strong policy board, moved to a one-man-and-secretary staff, and now has a vigorous and effective program giving it significant impact on the city of Houston. We have given them modest aid all along and continue to do so. They have been fairly successful, however, in securing local backing from corporations and individuals.

We would be willing to explore the possibility of a similar cooperative relationship with the CCIOHR. We feel that more human relations work needs to be done in Texas generally and would like to be assured of contact with a group such as yours in Austin. If you are interested and could suggest a time, perhaps early in September or sooner, I would be glad to fly to Austin to meet your group and discuss the matter. (I plan to be on vacation during the week of August 21.)

The other way in which we aid human relations groups is through program assistance from our special projects. We could provide consultants, for example, on problems of housing, urban planning, fair employment, school integration, public welfare problems, penal administration and criminal rehabilitation, or community organization (meaning, ordinarily, low-income communities or communities of ethnic minorities.) The one most likely to provide assistance of the kind you mention would be our Voter Education Project. The VEP is beginning to emphasize leadership training, as well as voter registration and citizenship education. On that basis you might submit a proposal to VEP, of which Mr. Vernon Jordan is director, with some hope of favorable response.

In that connection, the Information Director of the Voter Education Project, Mr. Marvin Wall, is to be in Austin on another matter on or about August 15. I shall give him a copy of your letter and of this reply and ask him to get in touch with you. I am sure he would be happy to talk to you if it is possible to arrange an appointment.

I enclose a copy of our "Guidelines for Voter Education Project Grants."

We are glad to hear from you and hope that we can be of help to you.

Dear Mr. Stanfield:

Dr. Witherspoon is presently away for two weeks active duty at the U.S. Naval Academy, Annapolis, Maryland, so I am taking the liberty of answering your letter. The travel situation being what it is, however, we are not quite sure of the exact date of his return--we do know that it will be during the latter part of the week of the 21st. In any event, I am forwarding your letter to Dr. Witherspoon and you should be hearing from him shortly.

Would you be so kind as to inform Mr. Marvin Wall, your information director on voter registration, that he is to call Mr. Jorge Guerra at either GR 7-4701 (office) or WA 6-4988 (home) in Austin if he wishes to contact the CCIOHR while he is here? This is necessary because Dr. Witherspoon is of the University of Texas Law School faculty, and the University operators may not remember that Mr. Wall is to call Mr. Guerra.

Even though Dr. Witherspoon will not be here on the 15th, we would still welcome an opportunity to exchange information with Mr. Wall. Mr. Guerra is quite familiar with the Austin situation, and should be able to give Mr Wall the overall picture plus some relevant data on human relations.

We look forward to profitable meetings with both you and Mr. Wall.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY AND THE SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

Mr. Stanfield is Director of Field Activities of the Southern Regional Council. This organization, founded 23 years ago, is one of the outstanding organizations in the South dealing with problems of equal opportunity. It has promoted registration and voting by minority groups; credit unions and cooperatives designed to improve the economic lot of the poor; better housing and better-planned urban renewal programs; removal of racial barriers in business, industry, and labor; equal justice; and equal employment and educational opportunity. Mr. Stanfield is in Austin, at the invitation of CCIOHR, to confer on the mutual interests of the two organizations. The Southern Regional Council, like CCIOHR, believes that for progress in human relations no person, whether he be an Anglo, Latin, or Negro, can afford to talk of going it alone. Both organizations favor the principle of "people of the several races, faiths, and professions working together for mutual goals." Both organizations believe that "the most compelling need is the development of our human resources" and that "unless this need can be met in a climate of racial amity, there is no real future for this region or, for that matter, for this nation."

FROM: Marvin Wall

Austin is a city of 200,000 in central Texas. About 18 per cent of the population is Negro, I am told, and about 18 per cent is Latin American. Texas people say it is neither the best city in Texas, from a human relations standpoint, nor the worst. It stands somewhere in the middle.

On Saturday, August 20, I met with five Austin citizens who belong to the Citywide Committee of Individuals and Organizations for Human Rights (CCIOHR). Present were Jasper Glover, Calvin C. Lynch, Jorge D. Guerra, Katheryn S. Clark, John J. Doyle, and Betty W. Plass.

Dr. Witherspoon of the University of Texas, who wrote Mr. Stanfield on July 25 requesting assistance from the Southern Regional Council, was not present. He was on a two-week tour of duty at the U.S. Naval Academy. Mr. Doyle, who also is connected with the University of Texas, attended as attorney pro tempore (in fact, he came out to St. Edward's University to see me the afternoon before the meeting).

The meeting was held at the El Azteca, Mr. Guerra's restaurant, from 10 a.m. until about noon. I also had several discussions at St. Edward's with Mrs. Lynch, who ~~severed~~ served as a counselor at the AFL-CIO youth meeting.

CCIOHR has members from all three population segments (representatives of all three were present at the Saturday morning meeting). The group has existed since 1963. It received a charter early this year. Its membership is about 200.

I outlined to the meeting, as best I could, the operation of the various Human Relations Councils in other states. I also outlined the Voter Education Project's programs. I explained that CCIOHR could ask for VEP help whether or not the Austin group enters into a working relationship with SRC similar to that of the Houston Council or Human Relations.

I explained the three VEP programs: registration, citizenship education, and leadership training. Judging from my discussions with Mrs. Lynch and with the group, there is a need in Austin for all three. It seems that registration drives have been conducted in Negro sections and to a lesser extent in Latino sections. However, registration and voter participation are quite low, as is the case in most of Texas. The NAACP in Austin, which the group considers ineffective, reportedly has planned something in the field of citizenship education. But the group's response was particularly enthusiastic, I thought, when I mentioned leadership training.

What would be the effect, I asked, if VEP sponsored in Austin a one-day workshop for local Negro and Latin candidates, campaign managers, poll watchers and the like? All agreed the effect would be great. It would draw together the minority groups and their supporters. It would help develop leadership, which CCIOHR say is urgently needed in Austin. And since Austin is the capital city, the effect would be noticed and felt statewide.

The political situation in Austin seems to be about the same as that for all Texas: dismal. The group says Austin's city governing body is neither knowledgeable nor concerned. CCIOHR ran into a brick wall trying to get the city council to set up an official human relations commission. The council instead set up a private group to receive human rights complaints. Given the nature of this private commission, it is not surprising that it is receiving no complaints.

Great as the need is for registration activity in Texas, I am inclined to doubt the worth of it under Texas' present law. Texas does not have permanent registration. It has annual registration. Voters must register between October and January each year to vote during the year following the registration period. So if one goes to the trouble of registering, it's good for one year only. Austin has a city election coming up in April. Given this circumstance, a brief registration drive in Austin might be worthwhile.

The group asked me what its next move should be. I suggested that it meet with Dr. Witherspoon when he returns and draft a letter asking Mr. Stanfield to meet with them. I also suggested that they go over the VEP guidelines and then draft a request to VEP. They said they would do this, subject to approval by the whole organization.

The organization's main focus now is on jobs and equal employment and all that goes with it. However, it is interested in the whole range of human relations.

After the meeting, I visited the organization's Citywide Center for Human Rights, which is near Huston-Tillotson College. The location seems excellent. The center is in an abandoned church-school-hospital. It is a large room on the ground floor rented from the Holy Cross Catholic Church for $20 a month.

The main activity seems to be job counseling. Mr. Guerra showed me job listings that had been obtained from various governmental and private agencies.

Poverty is an acute problem in Texas, particularly among the Latin-Americans. I was told several times that the Latins in Texas consider themselves more oppressed than the Negroes. Based on my limited observations, I doubt that "more oppressed" is accurate; I would say equally oppressed. Two marches aimed at raising the state minimum wage currently are being conducted in Texas. Both Negroes and Latins are involved.

After visiting the Citywide Center with Mr. Guerra, we took a tour of both Negro and Latino slums. I was vaguely reminded of slums in some Florida cities. For the most part, it appears, the two minority groups are in separate areas, although in some parts of the city they live together.

I would say that the minority groups in Austin have pressing economic, political and social needs. I am favorably impressed by the small group with which I met. Because Austin is a centrally located capital city, the benefits of what is done there would be wide. My own feeling is that if we are going to do anything at all in Texas, the proposals of the CCIOHR merit strong consideration.

Rights Law 'Abuse' Laid to 12 States

TITLE VI

AJ - 2/23/66

By MARGARET SHANNON
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23—The U.S. Civil Rights Commission Tuesday reported widespread segregation in hospitals and health and welfare programs in 12 Southern states, including Georgia, despite the 1964 law requiring nondiscrimination in federally aided projects.

There is spotty compliance, however, the commission said. In fact, it found one of the brightest spots at the Georgia State Hospital at Milledgeville.

The commission cited the plan for desegregation of accommodations and services at the big mental hospital as an example of how to go about complying with federal law.

Under a five-phase program begun last spring, the target date for completion of desegregation at the Milledgeville Hospital was last Nov. 15.

But that was the main good thing that the report had to say about the progress of desegregation in hospitals and welfare services.

IT RECOMMENDED that the U.S. Health, Education and Welfare Department "proceed immediately" to cut off federal funds where negotiations have failed to correct violations of Title 6 of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The commission was critical of the Health, Education and Welfare Department for being uninformed about the extent of compliance, but did point out that the compliance program was reorganized last month in an effort to strengthen it.

The report covered a commission study of some 40 communities in Georgia and 11 other states. The communities were in numerous instances places with some history of racial controversy, but there was an effort to examine a cross-section.

THE REPORT said that the 484-bed Macon Hospital had

Turn to Page 12, Column 1

RIGHTS LAW REPORT

made only minimal changes as of last August.

After the Civil Rights Act passed, the hospital converted its former Negro building into a facility for welfare patients only, the report said.

The hospital administrator told commission staff members that welfare patients were assigned to beds without regard to race, but no whites and Negroes were in the same rooms "because white patients 'found the money' to afford semiprivate or private accommodations when Negroes were moved into the same rooms or wards."

The Laurens County Hospital in Dublin had desegregated wards housing welfare patients, but had not assigned a Negro and a white patient to the same semiprivate rooms as of last July, the report said.

The commission said that the Georgia Health Department required every county health board to sign an assurance of compliance with federal desegregation regulations, but the Georgia Department of Family and Children Services (Welfare Department) did not require any from county welfare boards.

But the report said there was "no evidence" that state officials made any effort to determine the validity of the compliance statements by follow-through investigations.

SOMETIMES, the commission admitted, segregation continues because of long-time custom.

At a public health clinic in Macon, the commission field team noticed white women standing in the hallway while Negro women were in the waiting room.

In a health center in Milledgeville, racial entrance signs were removed, but Negroes continued to enter the clinic by the same old door as in the past, the report said.

Commission staff members found that a public health clinic in Dublin has been successful in eliminating customary segregation.

The clinic has dual accommodations, but they were being used by both races. Extensive segregation was found in nursing homes. In Americus, elderly white welfare patients make up one-half the patient population of the Magnolia Nursing Home and neither Magnolia nor any other nursing home in the county admitted Negroes.

WELFARE PATIENTS received federal funds and therefore their accommodations come under federal regulations. The rest of the patients in the nursing homes pay their own way.

The Georgia Welfare Department has informed local administrators that welfare clients must be sent only to doctors who comply with nondiscrimination regulations, the report said.

The Georgia department's directive said: "Physicians have the option to serve whomever they please, but if they elect not to serve applicants or recipients of our programs on a nondiscriminatory basis, the use of their services must be discontinued."

The Civil Rights Commission report said that the Georgia directives had been issued only a short time before commission staff members visited the state and it was "too soon to make a judgment of the effectiveness of this procedure."

School Aid Ruled Out In Toombs

AC - 3/2/66

WASHINGTON (AP) — Hearing examiners have ruled that the Toombs County, Ga., Board of Education is ineligible for federal aid because of its failure to comply with the anti-discrimination provisions of the Civil Rights Act.

School Supt. H. Dorsey Jordan said he had been informed of the ruling. "In fact they cut off funds last July," he said. He said his system of 1,800 white pupils and 70 Negro pupils received about $8,000 in federal funds the year before.

Jordan said Toombs County did not file a desegregation plan, adding the county board did not order that it be done, and one has not been drawn up since the deadline for filing the plan.

The board and Georgia Department of Education, a party in the case, contended at a hearing, among other things, that there had been a premature cut-off of funds.

Hearing examiner E. Robert Seaver ruled this issue was not within the scope of the case before him.

Formal termination of federal aid cannot be made effective under law until the decision of the examiner has been approved by the commissioner of education and secretary of welfare. Congress also must be given 30 days notice.

U. S. DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE
Public Health Service
Washington, D. C. 20201

For Release After 1 p.m., March 7, 1966

Surgeon General William H. Stewart today announced specific steps which the Public Health Service has taken to assure compliance in the health and medical fields with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Currently in the mails to the administrators of the Nation's more than 10,000 hospitals are: (1) letters explaining that to be eligible to receive Federal assistance or to participate in any Federally assisted program a hospital must be in compliance with Title VI; (2) Guidelines for Compliance, and (3) a Medical Facilities Compliance Report which the administrator is asked to complete and return by March 15. An Assurance of Compliance form has also been mailed to approximately 7,000 hospitals which have not as yet filed such forms.

In addition , the Surgeon General announced the establishment in the Public Health Service of an Office of Equal Health Opportunity which is charged with responsibility for the civil rights activities of all agencies of the Executive Branch which administer Federal assistance funds in the health and medical fields.

In his letter to hospital administrators, Dr. Stewart stated in part:

"The Public Health Service has been given the responsibility of ensuring compliance with Title VI in all hospitals receiving funds directly or indirectly from any department or agency of the Federal government. As a result, hospitals will be dealing with only one department of the Federal government instead of fifteen. Financial assistance is extended directly by the Federal Government for research, training or construction.. In other instances, the funds are for services rendered to clients of State administered health, welfare or rehabilitation programs.

"This activity of the Public Health Service does not relieve State and local recipients of Federal Grants, such as State or local health and welfare agencies, from continuing responsibility for determining that Federally supported programs do not use non-complying hospitals."

"Guidelines for Compliance with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964" is a two-page general explanation of what is required if a hospital is to be in compliance with Title VI. The document spells out that "hospitals in compliance with the Act are characterized by absence of separation, discrimination or other distinction on the basis of race, color or national origin in any activity carried on in, by or for the institution affecting the care and treatment of patients." It then sets forth the specific characteristics of compliance.

When signing the Assurance of Compliance Form, the authorized hospital official agrees that his institution will comply with the provisions of Title VI and that any necessary measures will be taken immediately to effectuate this agreement.

The Medical Facilities Compliance Report is a questionnaire which asks for specific information on civil rights practices within the hospitals in relation to the admission, care, and treatment of patients, the conduct of training activities, the utilization of staff and the extension of staff privileges.

The hospitals will be asked, for instance, to indicate whether patients are assigned to all rooms and facilities without regard to race, color, or national origin; whether all persons are allowed to use entrances, admission offices, waiting rooms, dining areas and cafeterias, toilets and lavatories, and other service facilities; whether the hospital accepts and approves applications for staff privileges and training without regard to race, color, or national origin; and other similar questions. An up-to-date patient census by race must be indicated on the questionnaire, as must a breakdown by race of physicians holding staff privileges.

If evidence of discriminatory practice is indicated in the returned questionnaire, the specific areas of failure to comply will be pointed out. The hospital will then be given an opportunity to eliminate its discriminatory practices as quickly as possible. Where discrimination persists, the hospital will be excluded from any new Federal assistance programs, such as Health Insurance for the Aged, which begins on July 1. When negotiations fail to achieve compliance, steps will be taken under Title VI to terminate present assistance, or compliance will be secured through enforcement by the courts.

The Office of Equal Health Opportunity is administratively located in the Office of the Surgeon General and will be headed by Mr. Robert M. Nash. It will employ a staff with special competencies and responsibilities in review and investigation of complaints, evaluation of complaint and compliance reports, public information activities, fiscal and statistical analysis, compliance negotiations, and development of recommendations for corrective action within the law, and will include experts in such areas as law, contracts, professional education and project grants, hospitals and nursing homes, and State and local health agencies.

Mr. Nash will eventually direct a staff of 100, for which recruiting is now in progress. Some 30 employees will be assigned to the Washington office, and the remaining 70 employees will be stationed in the nine regional offices of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Mr. Nash, who has directed civil rights activities of the Public Health Service in the over-all framework of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, is 49 years old and was born in West Swanzey, N. H. He received his masters degree in social service administration in 1941 from the University of Chicago, and worked for the New Hampshire Department of Welfare before entering Federal Service in 1943 with the Bureau of Public Assistance. In 1946 he joined the Public Health Service as a Hospital Program Representative, and has since served as Deputy Chief, and later Chief, of Grants Management in the Bureau of State Services. In 1964 he was named Assistant Grants Policy Officer in the Office of the Surgeon General, with primary responsibility for health program grants and Federal-State relations in regard to Public Health Service grants.

Statement

by

William H. Stewart, M. D.
Surgeon General, Public Health Service
U. S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

The Public Health Service intends to exert every effort to see that discrimination with respect to race, color or national origin is halted in all health and medical institutions and agencies receiving Federal assistance. This is the meaning, put most simply, of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as it pertains to the responsibilities of the Public Health Service. This is the meaning of Title VI to which I, and all of us in the Public Health Service, wholeheartedly subscribe.

The responsibilities for meeting this goal have been given to the Public Health Service by Secretary Gardner. Today we are announcing that the Service has set up an organizational unit to carry out our responsibilities, to provide a point of contact for those with whom we will be dealing in this area, to make certain policy decisions for the Service on civil rights, and to provide the Service-wide, indeed the government-wide, leadership for civil rights activities in health and medical affairs.

The organization we have created for these purposes, and which will be part of the Office of the Surgeon General, is called the Office of Equal Health Opportunity. This Office is now recruiting its full-time staff, beginning a review of the compliance status of the Nation's hospitals, and forming its plans for future action, as the news release you were given points out more fully.

Although it is administratively necessary to establish such a distinct unit to deal with civil rights, in no sense does this imply that civil rights are the concern only of this new Office. On the contrary, civil rights affairs necessarily permeate all parts of the Service, and are the responsibility of all employees of the Service.

There is a very strong feeling in the Federal government, in this Department, and in the Public Health Service, that this subject of civil rights is of the highest importance and priority. From the point of view of the Service, this activity will have impact on the quality of the health care provided to the American people; it impinges on such important matters as the proper distribution of our health resources; the recruitment and training of health workers; and the organization and efficiency of our health and medical institutions.

More importantly, of course, our activities in the field of civil rights will help to remove the discrepancy sometimes found between the humanitarian ideals of medicine and its day-to-day practices; while most importantly of all we hope to affirm and to assure the rights of all citizens within our democractic society.

To accomplish all this, we must be more than simply enthusiastic or pietistic -- we have learned, too, as those who have been in the frontlines of the battle for civil rights know, that we must be specific and unambiguous in our plans and policies, we must be patient and undiscouraged in the face of resistance, and we must be firm in our demands.

Much progress in eliminating discrimination has already been achieved during the past year through the voluntary action of hospitals in all parts of the country. The transition has not been as difficult as some were fearful it would be. On the contrary, choosing to offer equal treatment to all Americans has proved to be administratively, economically, and medically advantageous and correct.

We will have problems, to be sure. But I think everyone understands what we are asking and what we hope to accomplish. Our problems will be solved -- and they will be solved with a minimum of delay, suspicion, hurt feelings, or bad faith.

If I could not believe that, if I could not commit myself wholly to this good cause, then I would not have come here this afternoon.

Thank you.

GUIDELINES FOR COMPLIANCE WITH TITLE VI OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

Hospitals in compliance with the Act are characterized by absence of separation, discrimination or any other distinction on the basis of race, color, or national origin in any activity carried on in, by or for the institution affecting the care and treatment of patients.

Specifically, the above would include (but not be limited to) the following characteristics:

1. The hospital provides inpatient and outpatient care on a non-discriminatory basis; all patients are admitted and receive care without regard to race, color, or national origin. Declaration of an open admission policy may not be sufficient to effectuate compliance in some instances, particularly where the hospital has previously served only or primarily patients of one race. Where there is a significant variation between the racial composition of patients and the population served, the hospital has a responsibility to determine the reasons and to take corrective action if they are due to discriminatory practices.

2. All patients are being assigned to all rooms, wards, floors, sections, and buildings without regard to race, color, or national origin. In communities with non-white population, this results in bi-racial occupancy of multi-bed rooms and wards and use of single bed rooms on a non-discriminatory basis.

   Patients are not asked if they are willing or desire to share a room with a person of another race. Transfer of patients is not used as a device to evade compliance with the Act.

3. Employees, medical staff and volunteers of the hospital are assigned to patient services without regard to the race, color, or national origin of either the patient or employee. Courtesy titles (Mr., Miss, Dr.) whenever used, are being used throughout the hospital including patient care areas and news releases announcing admissions, births, deaths, etc.

4. The granting of permanent or temporary staff privileges is carried out in a non-discriminatory manner. Staff privileges are not denied professionally qualified personnel on the basis of race, color, or national origin, or on the basis of non-membership in an organization which discriminates on the basis of race, color, or national origin. Removal of staff privileges and other disciplinary actions shall not be based on race, color, or national origin.

5. Non-discriminatory practices of the institution include all aspects of training programs, and require recruiting and selection of trainees at both predominantly white and Negro schools. The same recruiting procedures are used at all such institutions. Third parties are not permitted to select trainees on a basis which, if done directly by the hospital, would be violative of the Civil Rights Act. These requirements apply to interns (medical, dental, OT, PT, dietician), residents and training programs such as graduate nurse, practical nurse, medical technology, x-ray technology, etc.

6. All services rendered by the institution, its employees or vendors to patients or others are provided without regard to race, color, or national origin. This would include:

   A. Administrative services (admission, medical records, fiscal, etc.).

   B. Medical and dental care for inpatients and outpatients (all specialties-clinical, diagnostic and other pathology services).

   C. Paramedical care and ancillary and supporting services (food, pharmacy, social services, laundry, toilet facilities, waiting rooms, entrances, exits, snack bars, gift shops, visiting hours, doctor's lounges). Patients and visitors are using all cafeteria facilities without regard to race, color, or national origin; no dining facilities are used only by non-whites by "custom" or "preference".

   D. Ambulance services.

7. Employees and medical staff have been notified in writing of the hospital's policy for compliance with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act.

8. Hospitals which have recently changed from discriminatory practices have taken steps to notify those who previously had been excluded from hospital services (e.g., letters to Negro physicians or physician organizations and Civil Rights leaders, notices to newspapers, posting of signs in hospitals, etc.).

9. Hospitals which have had dual facilities to affect racial separation have either converted one of them to a different purpose or have taken steps to change the traffic flow so that they are actually used bi-racially.

ASSURANCE OF COMPLIANCE WITH THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE REGULATION UNDER TITLE VI OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

_____ (hereinafter called the "Applicant")
(Name of Applicant)

HEREBY AGREES THAT it will comply with title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (P.L. 88-352) and all requirements imposed by or pursuant to the Regulation of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (45 CFR Part 80) issued pursuant to that title, to the end that, in accordance with title VI of that Act and the Regulation, no person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be otherwise subjected to discrimination under any program or activity for which the Applicant receives Federal financial assistance from the Department; and HEREBY GIVES ASSURANCE THAT it will immediately take any measures necessary to effectuate this agreement.

If any real property or structure thereon is provided or improved with the aid of Federal financial assistance extended to the Applicant by the Department, this assurance shall obligate the Applicant, or in the case of any transfer of such property, any transferee, for the period during which the real property or structure is used for a purpose for which the Federal financial assistance is extended or for another purpose involving the provision of similar services or benefits. If any personal property is so provided, this assurance shall obligate the Applicant for the period during which it retains ownership or possession of the property. In all other cases, this assurance shall obligate the Applicant for the period during which the Federal financial assistance is extended to it by the Department.

THIS ASSURANCE is given in consideration of and for the purpose of obtaining any and all Federal grants, loans, contracts, property, discounts or other Federal financial assistance extended after the date hereof to the Applicant by the Department, including installment payments after such date on account of applications for Federal financial assistance which were approved before such date. The Applicant recognizes and agrees that such Federal financial assistance will be extended in reliance on the representations and agreements made in this assurance, and that the United States shall have the right to seek judicial enforcement of this assurance. This assurance is binding on the Applicant, its successors, transferees, and assignees, and the person or persons whose signatures appear below are authorized to sign this assurance on behalf of the Applicant.

Some Officials Expect Repeal Of Title VI of Rights Act

TITLE VI AJ&C 10/9/66

By JOHN HERBERS

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON, Oct. 8 — Some administration officials are concerned that the most far-reaching desegregation law —Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 — is in danger of repeal — bit by bit.

Both houses of Congress have been chipping away at Title VI, which is intended to prohibit racial discrimination in any federally assisted program.

"Now when we call on Southern school officials for compliance, they just laugh at us," an official in the office of education said. "They feel they have the rest of the country on their side now."

On Thursday, the House voted, 220 to 116, to require a hearing before the Office of Education can delay sending federal funds to any school district suspected of practicing discrimination.

Both houses agreed to cut the civil rights enforcement appropriation to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare by $927,000. These actions are subject to approval in conference committee.

IN ADDITION, the department and the commissioner of education, Harold Howe II, have been criticized by members of Congress, from both the South and North, who say the department is going beyond the law in enforcement of Title VI.

Some officials within the department believe that damage done to Title VI so far is more psychological than substantative, although some officials in the administration believe Congress is not yet through with Title VI.

"A lot of people would like to see it repealed or gradually eroded away," one official said.

New opposition to Title VI is making a difficult enforcement task harder, a spokesman for HEW said.

If enforcement of Title VI followed every federal dollar, as it could, except for a few exemptions, it would be felt in almost all phases of life.

BUT THE administration has attempted to enforce it only in select programs, chiefly schools, hospitals, and the federal agencies.

Further, Title VI is not popular in the bureaucracy.

Many officials say privately they wish Title VI did not exist. It involves them in the emotional area of race relations they would rather avoid. And it distracts them from what they consider to be their major concerns because it carries the power to withhold funds.

The office of education is committed to integrated education. But some officials feel that civil rights problems have hindered the office's major job of building quality schools, whatever the racial balance.

In administering federal aid to secondary schools, the office has encountered complaints of "federal control" from all areas of the country, partly due, it is believed, to the side effects of Title VI enforcement.

THIS WEEK, Howe proposed before the House Rules Committee that enforcement of Title VI in school desegregation be delegated to the states. He said this could be incorporated in the general state administration of federal education programs, if the states wish to assume that responsibility.

The federal standards and guidelines would have to be maintained, Howe added.

Title VI has been enforced only in the South and border states. The office of education has made no attempt to enforce Title VI outside the South since last year when it deferred funds to Chicago and was overruled by the White House.

The reason for the general assault on Title VI now is that Southerners have mounted a campaign against it and many Northerners are sympathetic for the first time.

The main charge is that HEW is intent on achieving racial balance when the intent of the law is only to remove racial barriers.

HEW officials say that their desegregation guidelines actually permit a slower rate of integration than would have taken place without them.

"If we had just enforced Title VI outright," one official said, "they would have had to desegregate all at once instead of four grades a year. All we are trying to do is stop having Negro schools and white schools and just have schools."

State Refuses to File Rights Compliance—Will Try to Win Its Case in Court

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, June 17 — Alabama has served notice on the Federal Government that it will go to court in an attempt to avoid a cutoff of more than $90-million a year in welfare funds for failure to comply with the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Alabama is the only state that has not filed a form agreeing to try to bring about desegregation of all facilities receving Federal welfare funds. The state has said its own facilities are desegregated but it refuses to require integration of "third parties" such as doctors' offices and nursing homes.

Reid B. Barnes, a lawyer for the Alabama Welfare Department, put forth Alabama's position yesterday in a hearing before United States Welfare Comissioner Ellen Winston. He said the requirement for "third parties" could not be legally sustained under Title VI of the act which says there shall be no racial discrimination in any federally assisted program.

Mr. Barnes also said that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare had no authority to cut off funds for programs such as old - age assistance and care for dependant children because of noncompliance in health - care programs.

Congress to Be Notified

A formal hearing on Alabama's refusal to file the required form was held last Oct. 21. On April 5, a hearing examiner recommended a cutoff of funds.

The next step will be for the department to certify to Congress that a cutoff has been ordered. Thirty days thereafter the dispute is subject to judicial review.

Mr. Barnes acknowledged that Alabama did not file the required form and would try to win its case in the courts.

The allocation of funds will continue pending the court fight.

Alabama officials have said that some doctors are reluctant to desegregate their waiting rooms and facilities for fear of losing white patients.

Federal officials said they did not know the extent of separate waiting and examining rooms in Alabama doctors' offices. Throughout the South, the segregated office is not nearly so prevalent as it was several years ago.

Under the Medicare program, which goes into effect July 1, doctors will not be required to integrate their offices. The Social Security Administration, which administers the program, has ruled that Title VI does not apply in a doctor's private office.

Neither the department nor civil rights groups are said to be for cutting off the welfare funds. To do so would leave many thousands in Alabama, including Negroes, without subsistence.

The court review is expected to take a number of months. Department officials are said to believe that if the Government wins its case Alabama would then comply rather than lose the large amount of money involved.

Officials also are hoping for a change of policy by Alabama as more Negroes in that state become eligible to vote. The c rent policy against civil rig compliance was laid down Gov. George C. Wallace, wh term expires this year. His w Lurleen, is the Democratic n inee to succeed him but f Republican opposition in general election.

TRAINING FOR LEADERSHIP IN SOCIAL CHANGE

OFFERING A CORE CURRICULUM

of study, experimentation, and field work in several closely related major conflict areas of American society

- — the freedom struggle
- — full employment and urban development
- — problems in inter-group relations
- — community education and action for peace and international order

FIELD TRAINING OPPORTUNITIES with operating agencies to gain practical experience and to help the student find the work for which he is best suited

A PROFESSIONAL, FULL-YEAR PROGRAM on the graduate level open to students with a B.A. degree, or equivalent training and experience, who are interested in preparing for professional and volunteer program positions with agencies of social change

SITUATED in Chester, Pennsylvania, in the center of a highly industrialized metropolitan area extending from Philadelphia to Wilmington, Delaware. The Institute is one of a growing complex of educational institutions developing on the campus of the Crozer-Chester Medical Center and the Crozer Theological Seminary.

COSTS — Tuition, fees, board and room in dormitory—maximum of $1100. Limited scholarships are available on the basis of need.

A FACULTY academically qualified and experienced in areas of social change, augmented by visiting lecturers who in 1965-66 included:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Mr. Saul Alinsky | Dr. Kenneth Boulding | Dr. Robert Gilmore |
| Dr. Joseph Gittler | Dr. Staughton Lynd | Mr. Irving Morris |
| Dr. Victor Paschkis | Mr. Norman Hill | Mr. Bayard Rustin |

The Upland Institute is based on the concept that change is inherent in human institutions and attitudes, and that the growing complexity of contemporary society necessitates rapid and often drastic change if pressing human problems are to be met in a constructive manner. At a time of increasing reliance upon violence to achieve social change, we believe that man's intellectual abilities, his accumulated knowledge, and resources which spring from religious and secular insights and social heritage can be used to train men and women to engage in the processes of social change through non-violent, democratic methods.

The United States Commission on Civil Rights is a temporary, independent, bi-partisan Agency established by Congress in 1957 to:

Investigate complaints alleging that citizens are being deprived of their right to vote by reason of their race, color, religion, or national origin;

Study and collect information concerning legal developments constituting a denial of equal protection of the laws under the Constitution;

Appraise Federal laws and policies with respect to equal protection of the laws;

Serve as a national clearinghouse for civil rights information;

Investigate allegations of vote fraud; and

Submit interim reports and a final and comprehensive report of its activities, findings, and recommendations to the President and the Congress.

Dear Sam:

Your letter about the additional expenses for the school desegregation conference in North Carolina and the consultant at the Arkansas conference arrived this morning.

Unfortunately we returned the funds along with our report to the Foundation about three weeks ago. Paul is writing to Vernon Eagle to see if he can send back the needed money. If not, it is possible that we can make another arrangement. At any rate, we will let you know as soon as we find out.

I tried two or three times to return your call and am sorry I missed you.

Best wishes,

The U. S. Commission on Civil Rights

The U. S. Commission on Civil Rights is an independent, bipartisan agency established by Congress under the 1957 Civil Rights Act and authorized by the Civil Rights Acts of 1957, 1960, and 1964 to:

Voting

. . . Investigate complaints alleging that citizens are being deprived of their right to vote by reason of their race, color, religion or national origin.

. . . Investigate allegations of vote fraud.

Equal Protection of the Laws

. . . Collect and study information concerning legal developments constituting a denial of equal protection of the laws under the Constitution.

Clearinghouse

. . . Serve as a national clearinghouse for civil rights information.

Reports

. . . Submit reports of its activities, findings and recommendations to the President and the Congress.

The Commission is not an enforcement agency and has no power to provide specific remedies in individual cases. It refers complaints of denials of rights to the appropriate Federal administrative agency for corrective action.

Six Commissioners, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, determine policy for the agency. A Staff Director, also a Presidential appointee, supervises the professional and clerical staff of more than 100.

The Commission's field offices in Memphis, Tennessee and Chicago, Illinois, aid the agency in all of its programs.

STAFF ORGANIZATION

Commission programs are implemented through four major staff divisions. The Federal Programs Division evaluates Federal civil rights policies and their implementation and serves as liaison with other Federal agencies on civil rights matters. The Field Services Division directs field activities for the agency and is responsible for the coordination of field offices and the supervision of the 51 State Advisory Committees. The Research Division maintains a library of civil rights materials and develops short term as well as more extensive research projects. The Office of the General Counsel handles the agency's legal work and directs its voting projects. Complaints alleging denials of equal protection of the laws should be forwarded to the Office of the General Counsel.

The Commission also includes an Office of the Staff Director, an Office of Business Administration, and an Information Office which maintains liaison with news media, public and private groups, and the general public and, edits Commission publications.

PUBLIC HEARINGS

The Commission travels throughout the nation for fact-finding hearings relating to civil rights problems. Such hearings have been held in Jackson, Mississippi; Montgomery, Alabama; New Orleans, Louisiana; Atlanta, Georgia; Chicago, Illinois; Washington, D. C.; Los Angeles and San Francisco, California; Detroit, Michigan; Phoenix, Arizona; Newark, New Jersey; New York, New York; and Indianapolis, Indiana. Hearing rules safeguard the rights of every individual who appears before the Commission. Using the subpena power granted by Congress, the Commission seeks facts from local officials and other citizens representing diverse interests and points of view. The Civil Rights Act of 1960 and 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and some presidential executive orders reflect findings and recommendations resulting from Commission hearings and studies.

REPORTS

Major investigations and research projects have been conducted by the Commission staff relating to the denial of equal protection of the laws in voting, education, employment, housing and the administration of justice. Published Commission studies also deal with differences in the opportunities available to Negroes and whites in the armed forces and in programs of the Departments of Agriculture; Health, Education and Welfare; Labor and other Federal agencies.

CONFERENCES

The Commission sponsors national, regional and state conferences as part of its fact-gathering function and as a method of disseminating information to specialized audiences. These conferences bring together Federal, State and local officials, representatives of business, labor and civil rights groups, and community leaders to consider school desegregation, employment, equal housing opportunities, the 1964 Civil Rights Act, and other civil rights matters.

STATE ADVISORY COMMITTEES

More than 600 citizens from every state and the District of Columbia who are familiar with state and local civil rights problems serve without compensation on the 51 Advisory Committees to the Commission. These committees constitute a unique resource for securing information based on the experience and insight of persons with first-hand knowledge of problems in every part of the country. The committees also disseminate information on Federal law and policies.

The Commission often publishes reports prepared by the State Advisory Committees.

CLEARINGHOUSE

The Commission is a national clearinghouse for information relating to denials of Federal rights because of race, color, religion or national origin, including—but not limited to—the fields of voting, education, housing, employment, the use of public facilities and transportation and the administration of justice.

Under the clearinghouse function assigned by the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Commission collects, publishes and disseminates information to promote a better understanding of constitutional and statutory requirements relating to civil rights. Commission conferences and staff consultations help Federal, State and local governments as well as private institutions and individuals develop techniques for dealing with specific problems in the civil rights field.

PUBLICATIONS

A complete listing of Commission publications—statutory reports, interim reports, staff reports, state advisory committee reports, and transcripts of hearings and conferences—can be obtained by writing the Information Office of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. Most of the agency's published works are available in depository libraries throughout the country.

ASC ELECTIONS

How Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Community Committeemen are Elected

WHO CAN VOTE

You can vote in elections of Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Community Committemen if you are a farm owner, tenant or sharecropper. In community property law States both husband and wife can vote.

To know for sure who can vote ask your ASCS county office manager. He knows the rules and will help you. Here are some of the rules:

You can vote in an ASC election if you are old enough to vote in a State or national election and if you are taking part or are eligible to take part in ASCS farm programs.

If you're not old enough to vote, but you do run an entire farm, you can vote.

WHO CAN BE ELECTED

You could be elected an ASC Committeeman yourself. This would be an honor as well as a responsibility.

Of course there are some limits as to who can be elected. If you already are an elected officer in your county or State, or if you hold a national office you can't be a Committeeman. (However, being a member of a school board or on the board of a soil conservation, irrigation, drainage or weed control district, or similar type board, does not make you ineligible.) If you are an officer, employee or delegate to a convention of any political party or political organization, or if you work full time for the U. S. Department of Agriculture, you can't serve on an ASC Committee.

PUTTING NAMES ON THE BALLOT

Names get on the ballot in three ways. The community committee now in office names at least six persons. The county committee may name others.

---

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service

PA-676 August 1965

(Minority group farmers will be placed on the ballot in the same proportion as they are to the total number of farmers in the county.) You and your farmer neighbors can also add names to the ballot by sending in a petition naming a person you think would make a good committeeman. The petition must be signed by at least six farmers eligible to vote in the ASC election. You can sign as many petitions as you wish. The community committee will check with each nominee to determine that he is willing to serve. Names of nominees will be placed on the ballot in alphabetical order.

VOTING YOUR BALLOT

Public notice of the election will be in newspapers and on radio and television in your county. In addition a notice of the election and a ballot will be mailed to all eligible voters of record in the county office. If you believe you are eligible to vote and do not receive a ballot, check with your ASCS county office.

When you get your ballot there will be two envelopes with it. One will be plain. The other will have a statement printed on the back. There will also be instructions on how and when to send the ballot back to the county office. Mark your ballot and seal it inside the plain envelope. Put the sealed plain envelope inside the envelope with the statement on the back. This statement is a certification that the ballot was marked by you personally without undue influence by any person. A witnessed mark is O. K.. This statement must be signed or your vote will not be counted. Mail or take your ballot to the ASCS county office.

COUNTING THE VOTES

When the ballot gets back to the county office, the inside envelope with your ballot will be taken out. The outside envelope will be separated from the envelope containing the ballot. This assures that your ballot will be secret. No one can know how you voted unless you tell him.

The county committee will count the votes. They will do this at a place, date and time they announce ahead of the counting. The place where they count the vote will be open to everyone regardless of race, creed or color. You and your friends — or anyone else who wants to — can watch the vote counters open the envelope and count the ballots.

ELECTING FARMER COMMITTEEMEN TO ADMINISTER ASCS PROGRAMS

An explanation prepared especially for the use of ASC County and Community Committeemen

Each year, between July 1 and December 30 — as determined by the appropriate State Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Committee — farmers and ranchers elect new members to represent them on community and county ASC committees.

The locally elected farmers supervise and administer Federal farm programs directly affecting the health, welfare, and economic well-being of every American. These include agricultural conservation, price support, acreage allotment and marketing quota, wool incentive payment, sugar, voluntary wheat and feed grain diversion and various other programs assigned to ASCS by the Secretary of Agriculture or the Congress.

WHO SERVES ON ASC COMMITTEES

ASC committeemen are men and women engaged in the operation of a farm or ranch. They represent various types of farming and agricultural regions in the county or community.

Each community committee consists of a chairman, vice-chairman, regular member, and first and second alternates. All three members are delegates to the county convention which elects the county committee. Alternate committeemen are alternate delegates.

The county committee is made up the same way. The county agricultural extension agent is an ex officio member, but does not vote.

COMMITTEEMAN QUALIFICATIONS

A nominee for ASC committeeman must be eligible to vote in ASCS elections in the county or community where he is elected. He must reside in the county or ASCS community where elected. He must be of good character, not a member of (or candidate for) any Federal, State or county office filled by election pursuant to law. However, members of school boards, soil conservation district boards, irrigation, drainage, weed control or similar boards are not ineligible because of such membership. Officers, employees or delegates to a convention of any political party or political organization are ineligible. So are full-time employees of the U. S. Department of Agriculture.

A nominee for county committeeman or alternate must not: (1) Be a sales agent or employee of Federal Crop Insurance Corporation during his term of office; (2) have passed his 70th birthday by the date the new term of office begins unless this is waived by the State Committee; (3) have served three consecutive terms immediately prior to current elections. (Any term which began on or before January 1, 1965 does not count toward this three-term limitation.)

The community committee checks with each nominee to determine his willingness to serve.

Names of nominees will be placed on the ballot in alphabetical order.

TERMS OF OFFICE

Community committeemen and alternates serve 12 months or until qualified successors are elected. Their term begins on the first day of the month following election.

County committeemen serve 3-year, staggered terms starting in 1966. Alternates serve 1-year terms. Terms begin the first day of the month following election. Committeemen and alternates must sign the prescribed Oath of Office before taking office.

WHO VOTES FOR ASC COMMITTEEMEN

Any person is eligible to vote if he is of legal voting age and has an interest in a farm as owner, tenant or sharecropper. OR

If not of legal voting age, a person is eligible if he supervises and conducts the farming operations on an entire farm where one of the following requirements is met: (1) The farm received or will receive a payment or is carrying out an approved practice under the current agricultural conservation program; (2) the farm has an acreage allotment or marketing quota; (3) the farm is eligible for a cooperator's loan or other price support, OR a sugar program payment, OR a national wool program payment, OR a soil bank payment; (4) the farm is eligible to participate in any farm program administered by the county committee.

WHEN ARE ELECTIONS HELD

County and community elections are held between July 1 and December 30. The State Committee sets the dates. The county committee notifies voters.

Although State Committees may authorize elections by meeting or at a polling place, the trend in recent years has been toward use of mail ballots. Farmers in many States have shown a preference for this method. Since it is more convenient, it has resulted in greater voter participation than either of the other two methods. A step-by-step description of Mail Election follows.

CONDUCTING THE ELECTION

1. At least 40 days prior to the date set for return of ballots by farmers (E-Day), the State Committee approves community boundaries.

2. At least 30 days before E-Day, the county committee publicly notifies farmers that slates of nominees will be selected for each community. This notice, disseminated by newspaper, radio, TV, and public poster, is also sent personally to each eligible voter of record. The county committee may not have a complete list of eligible voters so it is each eligible voter's responsibility to contact the ASCS county office and get on the list. The notice announces the forthcoming election, invites petitions for additional nominees, and prescribes the method of preparing a petition. Any group of six or more eligible voters may submit a petition. A person may sign as many petitions as he desires. The final date for receiving nominating petitions must be at least 20 days prior to E-Day.

3. At least 15 days prior to E-Day, the community committee nominates at least six persons eligible to hold office. The county committee will make sure that qualified minority-race nominees are included in the same proportion as minority-race farmers are to total farm population (owners, tenants and sharecroppers) in the county.

4. At least 10 days before E-Day, the county committee will give public notice of the election including the slate of candidates (failure to give this notice is grounds for invalidating the election), the date ballots will be mailed to eligible voters, instructions for getting ballots in case eligible voters fail to receive them by mail, date by which marked ballots must be mailed or returned, where to send them, invitation to the public to witness the vote counting (including information on date, time and place of counting), and a statement that the county committee will settle questions on election procedures or eligibility to vote or hold office. Appeals from a county committee ruling will be heard by the State Committee.

5. If the certification on the envelope is not signed, the ballot will not be considered as a vote. A witnessed mark will qualify as a signature.

COUNTING THE BALLOTS

The county committee will count the ballots, except that a county committeeman who is a candidate for community committeeman may not count ballots.

The place where ballots are counted will be where facilities are open to all persons without regard to race, color, creed or national origin.

The time and date for counting will allow adequate time for receiving ballots from every community, but cannot be later than 5 days after E-Day.

DECLARING AND NOTIFYING WINNERS

The person receiving the most votes is elected community committee chairman. The second most votes determines the vice-chairman, the third most votes decides the regular member. All three are county convention delegates. The person getting the fourth most votes is first alternate committeeman and first alternate delegate. The fifth most votes determines the second alternate committeeman and second alternate delegate.

The county committee will promptly inform all nominees of election results, and will notify community committeemen and delegates of their election, and of the date, time and place of the county convention.

THE COUNTY CONVENTION

The State Committee will set the date for the convention, designating a convenient place that does not restrict the use of its facilities to any person because of race, color, creed, or national origin.

The county committee will give at least 10 days public notice stating the time, place and date, and declaring the convention open to all who wish to attend.

The incumbent county committee organizes and supervises the convention. A quorum consists of a majority of the delegates or their alternates. After a permanent chairman is elected, all incumbent committeemen retire from the room but remain available for advice or consultation.

The convention will nominate and elect three committeemen and two alternates. In 1965 they will nominate and elect committeemen for specific terms of office as follows: One for a 3-year term; one for a 2-year term; one for a 1-year term. In subsequent years, committeemen will be elected to fill vacancies only, with vacancies occurring in the same order as established in the 1965 elections. Alternates will be elected for 1-year terms only.

RECORDS AND REPORTS

Election records and reports pertaining to community elections will be sealed and kept in the county office for 30 days.

Minutes of all county convention actions and the name of each delegate present will be kept. Ballots will be sealed in containers and kept in the county office for 30 days.

Results of the county convention election will be sent to the ASC State Committee for review and approval.

CIVIL RIGHTS -- 1965

This report was prepared from information supplied by the agencies it covers. It depicts their efforts as of January 1966 to obtain compliance with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and is best understood when measured against the adverse conditions found in these agencies in the 1965 Civil Rights Commission Report, "Equal Opportunity in Farm Programs."

The report shows steady though uneven progress.

Your comments are invited.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

CIVIL RIGHTS -- 1965

The new year brings the first anniversary of the Department's civil rights regulations and an opportunity to record the past year's activities.

Beginning in early 1965, the Department of Agriculture was characterized as the "bad guy" in civil rights in the Federal Government. Our record was poor; we admitted it. We did something about it. What we did we describe in the following pages in two sections: The first section discusses our actions in implementing the four recommendations made by the Civil Rights Commission in its March 1965 report "Equal Opportunity in Farm Programs"; the second section records numerical progress in implementing Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. We boast that we have begun the job of assuring justice for everyone, but we do not pretend to have finished that job. We report continuing progress, but it is uneven and unfinished.

SECTION ONE ## PART I -- DEPARTMENT ACTIONS TO ELIMINATE DISCRIMINATION

A. Reorganization

The Department reorganized to insure efficient management of growing civil rights responsibilities in the areas of employment, contract compliance, and Title VI. The Secretary appointed an Assistant to the Secretary for Civil Rights to work with agency civil rights coordinators and to act as the overall coordinator for all Departmental civil rights activities. To bolster efforts to achieve equal employment opportunity in Federal contracts, the Department created in July 1965 a Contract EEO Management Division in the Office of Plant and Operations and appointed a chief. A professional staff of eight has been employed over the past few months. The Office of Personnel remained responsible for assuring equal employment opportunity in the Department.

B. Policy Declaration

During the year the Secretary clarified the Department's equal opportunity policy in several important areas: "The Department of Agriculture, as a matter of policy, shall conduct all its business fully in accord with the principle that every citizen shall receive fair and equal treatment in order that there be no discrimination in any of our activities or programs." The Secretary requested immediate action to: (1) Encourage minority group participation in both administration and benefits of local program activities; (2) Eliminate all remaining segregation and discrimination in office space and related facilities at field installations; (3) Establish procedures to enforce nondiscriminatory assignments so that all personnel serve all clientele equally without regard to race; (4) Establish methods of evaluating effective procedures to bring about full participation for all in Department programs.

Procedural guidelines were sent to agency heads and civil rights coordinators to assure prompt and effective handling of complaints of discrimination. The guidelines directed that such complaints be sent to the Office of the Inspector General with copies going to the appropriate agency head and to the Assistant to the Secretary for Civil Rights.

C. Dissemination of Policy

The Department had a luncheon meeting for USDA personnel at each of the regional Title VI Civil Rights Commission conferences last fall to reemphasize the Secretary's commitment to eliminate all discrimination and to bring equal service and participation to all.

To reaffirm top-level commitment to stated civil rights policies, the Executive Assistant to the Secretary, the Assistant to the Secretary for Civil Rights and the Director of Personnel traveled nationwide to seven cities in November and December to meet with more than 350 top USDA personnel in the field. They discussed problems and progress in the implementation of equal employment opportunity and nondiscriminatory service.

In addition to sending civil rights materials to their field staff, those agencies with substantial program activity in the South have spent a great deal of time in conferences and training programs to explain the Civil Rights Act. For example: (1) Washington C&MS personnel held training schools for two days in the Southeast and Southwest Area Offices to inform C&MS personnel of the provisions of the Civil Rights Act, the implementing regulations, and their responsibility for putting these regulations into effect. (2) SCS representatives, after training in conferences, have discussed civil rights policy and its application with almost every governing body of soil conservation districts and organizations sponsoring Resource Conservation and Development projects and subwatershed projects. (3) In four regional meetings held last June, the FHA Administrator put major emphasis on USDA nondiscrimination policies.

D. Appointment of Advisory Committee

In April the Secretary appointed 16 men of distinguished and varied backgrounds to the Citizens Advisory Committee on Civil Rights to assist in implementing both the letter and the spirit of the Civil Rights Act. The Committee has met with administrators of several agencies in four meetings this year to acquaint itself with some of the problem areas in the Department. Because of its concern over the failure of a great percentage of graduates from predominately Negro colleges to qualify on the Federal Service Entrance Examination and therefore to qualify for USDA employment, the Committee met with representatives of the Negro and white Land Grant colleges to explore this problem. Subsequent meetings with college representatives may produce some recommendations for expanded course work in a strengthened agricultural curriculum or a centering of specialized training opportunities on one campus in the State.

The Committee recommended a more substantial program to bring information about Department services to low-income people. Pursuant to this suggestion, the Office of Information has developed special materials which will be described in Section II-A.

E. Service Regardless of Race

In addition to disseminating the Department policy of service without regard to race, color, or national origin of either the employee or the client, agencies have directed specific attention to this area.

ASCS -- The agency has issued a specific policy and reports that all employees are serving clients without regard to race.

C&MS -- The agency has issued specific instructions on service and reports that all employees are serving without regard to race.

FCS -- The agency's employees are serving clients without regard to race in accordance with specific policy issued on this subject.

FHA -- FHA issued a policy statement prohibiting assignment of FHA personnel by race and assigned the county supervisor the responsibility to see that service was without regard to color. To assure policy implementation the area supervisor who makes continuing reviews of county offices must report to the State Director whether employees are assigned duties without regard to race. From the monthly reports from State Directors, FHA believes progress is being made in assuring that Negro employees serve all borrowers.

FS -- The policy requiring employees to serve National Forest users on an equal basis without regard to race, color, or national origin has been fully enforced.

REA -- The REA compliance report submitted by borrowers on November 30 contained a certification that borrowers' employees served all persons without regard to the race, color, or national origin of the employee or the client. Field personnel will be checking this during their next regular compliance review.

SCS -- All employees are required to serve clients without regard to race. SCS reports that its staff has followed up to see that this policy has been implemented and that audits and inspections indicate things generally are going well in this area.

Success in providing nondiscriminatory service will be assured by continuing agency surveillance of field staff activity as well as by the independent investigations of the Office of the Inspector General.

F. Integrated Housing

In the first survey of discriminatory practices in April 1965 the Office of Plant and Operations reported 188 instances in which our offices were located in buildings having segregated facilities, such as separate restrooms and drinking fountains. Due to the commendable efforts of the State Advisory Committees, the Office of Plant and Operations reported as of December 15 all but seven cases resolved. Four of the seven cases were to be settled by December 31, 1965. The three cases remaining await the outcome of pending court action to remove segregation signs in one instance and new facilities in the other two instances.

Forest Service reports that all State Foresters, State employees who administer the Forest Service Cooperative State and Private Forestry Program, are now housed in nonsegregated buildings.

G. Civil Rights Audits and Investigations

The Office of the Inspector General finished the first phase of its special three-phase civil rights audit in June. The initial audit was performed to learn the extent of compliance with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act and to examine compliance with Executive Order 10925 in 8 major USDA agencies in 134 locations in 35 States. In evaluating USDA activities through June 1965 the Office of the Inspector General saw the period of January through March as a time of agency self-evaluation and slow action. From April through June action was considerably more aggressive and resulted in substantial progress. The June review revealed, however, that many of the discriminatory practices reported by the Civil Rights Commission still existed and that there were additional problems to deal with, such as instances of inadequate efforts to recruit and employ minority group personnel and of inadequate plans to insure that minority group clientele are informed of USDA programs.

The second phase of the civil rights audit will begin shortly. In addition to checking corrective action in some locations initially reviewed, coverage will be extended to other locations and to an examination of equal employment opportunity in contract compliance.

The Office of the Inspector General also has had the prime responsibility for investigating all allegations of discrimination in Department programs. According to procedure prescribed in the Department's Title VI regulations all discrimination complaints are sent to OIG for determination of the manner of investigation. If OIG determines that the complaint arises from a misunderstanding of the operation of the program or is solely a program problem with no racial overtones, the complaint is referred to the agency for appropriate handling. From January 1965 to December 1965, OIG had completed 61 investigations of discrimination charges in 20 States and the District of Columbia. Forty-one of the complaints originated in the 15 southern States (Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia). The distribution of complaints among agencies was as follows: Agricultural Research Service - 2; Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service - 21; Consumer and Marketing Service - 14; Cooperative State Research Service - 1; Farmers Home Administration - 7; Federal Extension Service - 7; Forest Service - 3; Plant and Operations - 1; and Rural Electrification Administration - 5. Forty-three complaints alleged discrimination in employment practices including complaints of discrimination in the employment practices of USDA contractors. Twenty-two complaints alleged discrimination in provision of services and in ASCS elections. (Some complainants made more than one charge.) OIG reports that the number of complaints is increasing particularly from the southeastern States. Twenty-five additional complaints are currently being investigated or are awaiting investigation.

PART II -- DEPARTMENT ACTIONS TO ENCOURAGE AND EXTEND FULL PARTICIPATION IN DEPARTMENT PROGRAMS OF ALL CLIENTELE WITHOUT REGARD TO RACE

A. Increasing Information to Minority Groups

The Office of Information has developed a variety of materials designed to inform minority groups of USDA programs and services and how to take part in them as well as to help convince them that they have a full right and are expected to participate.

To this end, and at the recommendation of the Citizens Advisory Committee on Civil Rights, a set of 50 color slides entitled "At Your Service" was developed to explain USDA programs and services to hard-to-reach families. More than 300 sets of slides and accompanying narration are being distributed by agency offices in the rural South. The Office of Information is making sure that the slides are used widely. To encourage use by civil rights groups, 200 copies of the pictorial narration guide describing the slides were sent to these organizations.

The Office of Information also produced four different slide spot-announcements which have been sent to 75 selected TV stations on a trial basis. As soon as the acceptability of these spots is measured, materials will be sent to additional television stations.

In addition, at the recommendation of the Citizens Advisory Committee, the Office of Information prepared a 24-page publication describing Department programs in simple language and pictures to low-income people. This booklet, "You Too Can Get Help," was issued November 29, 1965, and 200,000 copies were printed for distribution by the Department as well as by vocational agriculture teachers, churches, civic and civil rights organizations and the press.

Work with the Negro press has been intensified with increased emphasis on providing information on sources of assistance. Success stories about Negro farm families plus announcements of Negro appointments to significant positions in the Department is increasing confidence in the Department's nondiscriminatory policy and is encouraging Negro students to seek work opportunities in Agriculture.

The Office of Information, again at the suggestion of the Citizens Advisory Committee, is exploring with HEW and agency representatives the possibility of using educational television to reach low-income rural people with information to help them help themselves. Educational television pilot projects are expected to get underway shortly.

Several agencies have given special attention to preparing information to acquaint minority groups with available services and their right to participate in the programs.

ASCS -- Over 1,800,000 leaflets entitled, "ASC Elections," (Pa-676) were issued to farmers and others, primarily in the South. Here are excerpts from this leaflet: "Minority group farmers will be placed on the ballot in the same proportion as they are to the total number of farmers in the county"; "The place where they count the votes will be open to everyone, regardless of race, creed, or color." ASCS also distributed 35,000 leaflets, "Electing Farmer Committeemen to Administer ASCS Programs" (Pa-677) to county and community committeemen and to civil rights organizations.

The agency sent a memorandum to all State Chairmen for news for press and radio which read in part: "Eligibility to vote or to hold office as a committeeman is not restricted by reason of race, color, creed, or national origin."

C&MS -- The Consumer and Marketing Service is reviewing a preliminary draft of a popular style leaflet which will include information on the applicability of the nondiscrimination rules and regulations for distribution to persons involved in the State and local operations of the program. Publication is planned for early 1966.

C&MS has developed program material in Spanish and the agency is considering translating radio and television materials into Spanish.

FHA -- Farmers Home Administration has undertaken a variety of publicity techniques to impress the public that the agency services are available to all. Examples include: Public dedications or tours of all major FHA financial projects in communities where projects serve Negroes; a weekly action bulletin for State Directors reporting specific "success" stories highlighting successful techniques and reminding the directors of the continuing need for more effective communications with the public; Washington and field personnel cooperation in the preparation of hundreds of articles for news media that demonstrate the agency serves all people; agency pamphlets explaining FHA services are available to all people; integration of projects where separate applications have come from Negro and white families for financial assistance to develop water systems and cooperative enterprises; major emphasis on working with and speaking before Negro and other minority group organizations and seeking out local Negro leaders to discuss local problems.

FS -- A standard sign informing the public that no discrimination is permitted and that complaints should be addressed to the Chief of the Forest Service was distributed for posting on all permit areas of a public service nature.

Forest Service is designing brochures to include pictures of Negroes using recreational areas.

B. Increasing Communications With Minority Groups

The Office of the Assistant to the Secretary for Civil Rights has maintained direct and continuing contact during the year with many local and State civil rights organizations. All agencies are initiating contacts with civil rights groups and other groups concerned with the rural poor in an effort to broaden the knowledge of opportunities offered under their programs and to be more responsive to the needs expressed by these groups. For example:

ARS -- The Assistant Director of Agricultural Research Service has made visits to several predominately Negro colleges exploring the possibility of contracts and grants, employment of their graduates and employment of their faculty during summer.

ASCS -- Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service has increased its communication with minority groups by inviting them to various meetings held by ASCS personnel and by meeting with farm and civil rights groups to discuss farm programs, elections procedures, and employmemt practices. Groups ASCS has had contact with include SNCC, Alabama Council on Human Relations, CORE, and the National Sharecroppers Fund.

C&MS -- Work has been done with the Office of Economic Opportunity to get material on their programs distributed and explained to low-income groups. The agency has met with a representative of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party to get suggestions on further steps to assure that Mississippi Negroes are adequately informed on all food distribution programs. In addition, the administrators of the National School Lunch and Special Milk Programs have met or communicated with CORE, NAACP, COFO, Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, New Harlem Tenants League, and SNCC. Since September 1965, C&MS field people have attended 17 meetings sponsored by church, civic, and civil rights groups to explain the program to low-income people. The contacts have provided an excellent opportunity for explaining the programs and clearing up misconceptions.

C. Increasing Participation of Negroes in the Decision-Making Process

In the past minority groups have not been represented in the local administration of program benefits and consequently their program participation has been limited in too many instances. Agencies have been busy increasing minority group involvement in decision making bodies.

ASCS has increased minority group participation in the decision-making process through election and committee participation. Prior to January 1965 Negroes' names had not, with rare exceptions, been placed on ballots as candidates, and Negroes participated in ASCS elections in few areas in the South. In January 1965, when ASCS first assumed responsibility for the elimination of discrimination in these elections, 75 Negroes were serving as community committeemen in 11 southern States. Today there are 519.

As of January 1965 there were no Negroes elected to county committees in the South. Today there are 5 who serve as second alternates.

ASCS -- Prior to January 1965 no Negro had ever been appointed by The Secretary of Agriculture to a State ASC committee in the South. Since then, the Secretary has appointed three Negroes to ASC State committees. They are now serving in Arkansas, Maryland, and Mississippi and their names have been submitted for reappointment in 1966.

ASCS -- To increase the participation of Negroes in policy-making decisions the Administrator appointed 47 Negroes to ASC State Advisory Committees in 11 southern States. The Committee members are to assist in assuring nondiscriminatory program administration at the State and county level, equal access to ASCS information and full participation in ASCS elections. ASCS will work on ways to make this committee's participation more effective.

ASCS -- In 1965 the administrator appointed 62 Negroes for regular one-year terms on Review Committees in southern States. These committees, established under the authority of 1938 legislation, function to review appeals from farmers dissatisfied with their marketing quota. Seventy-three Negroes have been appointed to this committee for 1966.

C&MS -- Consumer and Marketing Service has appointed a Negro to its Advisory Committee on Criteria for Poultry Inspection.

C&MS -- The Food Stamp Act provides that the Department take steps to obtain cooperation on the part of State, local, or private agencies to carry out informational and educational programs concerning nutrition. C&MS has encouraged the development of committees to prepare nutrition education materials designed to assist low-income people in making better use of their increased purchasing power. In 18 counties in the Southeast which have nutrition education committees there are 187 committee members of which 64 are Negro. The Office of the Secretayy has assisted C&MS in making many of these contacts with local Negro leaders.

FHA -- Prior to the Administrator's memorandum in April 1965 directing State Directors in the southern States to appoint a Negro as a regular committeeman in each county in selected States where there were 20 percent or more nonwhite farmers in the county, there were 18 regular and 127 alternate county committee members. As of October 31, 1965, there were 349 regular Negro committee members and six alternate county committee members in Arkansas, Louisiana, Florida, Mississippi, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Alabama, and Virginia. Nationwide on the same date there were 374 regular Negro committee members and 11 alternates. Compliance reports from State Directors have uniformly indicated that Negro committeemen have been given the same training as other committee members and are participating fully and equally in the committee work.

SCS -- Phase I Audit reports showed that SCS work units had no plans to increase participation of minority groups, so SCS listed methods to achieve greater participation of minority groups and required States to see that they were put in use. Although States indicate appropriate steps have been undertaken, SCS's review of quarterly progress reports will measure actual accomplishments.

D. Extension of Service to Minority Groups

Agencies accompanied increased information programs with efforts to extend service to those previously unserved. For example:

FHA -- FHA progress in increasing loan service to Negro farmers in 16 southern States during the 1965 fiscal year is recorded below:

Initial Loans to Negro Applicants
By Type of Loan
Sixteen Southern States - 1964 versus 1965

| | 1964 | | 1965 | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Kind of Loan | No. To Negroes | Percent to Negroes | No. to Negroes | Percent to Negroes |
| Operating | 3,425 | 26 | 4,391 | 31 |
| Farm Ownership | 354 | 8 | 526 | 12 |
| Soil and Water | 51 | 11 | 38 | 10 |
| Rural Housing | 548 | 7 | 1,282 | 14 |
| Emergency | 2,174 | 29 | 2,476 | 26 |
| Economic Opportunity | -- | -- | 2,293 | 40 |
| TOTAL | 6,552 | | 11,006 | |

RCDS -- One of the principle challenges to the Rural Community Development Service is to make effective contact with impoverished rural Negroes in the South. The agency brings information on services and assists people to take the steps necessary to benefit from these services. In spite of the newness of the task, notable progress has been made in getting information to low-income minority people. In some instances better information has resulted in important strides toward increased income, better training, and better living conditions. During the past year field representatives serving Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia have all been involved in the extension of programs to unserved areas and to minority groups. The field representatives have been helpful to OEO in extending and promoting integrated community action programs in rural areas, in promoting Title III and Title IV loans to all needy persons, and in developing a number of integrated "Head Start" preschool programs in rural areas. These field representatives have also assisted in promoting programs of the Small Business Administration, the Economic Development Administration, the Department of Housing and Urban Development and others on an integrated basis.

C&MS Food Stamp, Commodity Donation Programs -- Participation by Negroes in counties where the program operates is comparatively high because Negroes comprise such a large proportion of low-income families. However, there are dozens of very low-income, high-Negro-population counties in the South which do not have either program -- gaps in coverage are particularly severe in Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina and Virginia. However, some progress has been made in extending the programs, notably in Mississippi, which with the assistance of the Department recently worked out a 6-month demonstration project designed to bring all counties in the State into a commodity food program available to all needy persons.

C&MS School Lunch -- To increase participation in the School Lunch program in low-income areas which are frequently areas with a large Negro population, Consumer and Marketing Service is applying the newly appropriated $2 million (Section 11, National School Lunch Act). Results, as demonstrated in a special project in North Carolina, are dramatic. The six Negro schools chosen for the North Carolina Project were charging 25¢ or 30¢ for lunch and had participation of from 19 to 35 percent of the student body. When the price of the lunch was reduced 15¢ by increased Federal assistance the average increase in participation was 157 percent.

Other efforts over the past 2 years, such as increasing the reimbursement rate for free lunches, have stimulated participation and succeeded in extending the program to 1,200 needy schools with 170,000 children participating.

Special Milk -- The level of participation of Negro children in the Special Milk program is fairly high because subsidization has reduced the price to 3¢ or 4¢ in most areas.

REA -- The area coverage policy of providing service to all consumers in the service area of borrowers and the wide acceptance of this policy by borrowers generally has been responsible over the years for the high percentage of farms now receiving electric service and the substantial progress that has been made in extending modern telephone service in rural areas.

FCS -- The Farmer Cooperative Service has responded to numerous requests for information and advisory assistance from minority groups considering the establishment of cooperatives and has also had productive discussions with managers of some of the key cooperatives in the South on increasing the participation of minority groups.

ERS -- The Economic Research Service is extending assistance to predominately Negro institutions which in the past have had little opportunity to participate in USDA research grants. The new Economic Development Division is focusing on the improvement of living conditions of low-income people and on the development of low-income areas. This effort will bring greater research attention to the problems of rural racial minorities who comprise a sizable segment of the rural poor.

CSRS -- Cooperative State Research Service has requested $1 million for fiscal year 1967 to support research grants to improve agricultural research competence in former Negro Land Grant Colleges. Present authority (for basic research) exists under two acts, however, the proposed amendment to PL 89-106 to include authority for training would increase the possibility of assistance to these institutions.

PART III - DEPARTMENT ACTION TO ASSURE EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY

A. Reaffirmation of Policy

The Assistant Secretary for Administration reaffirmed the Department's commitment to take affirmative action to secure equal employment opportunity ... "Qualified minority personnel are to be sought out ... they shall have full access to training programs, work assignments, details, and many other techniques to qualify them for appropriate advancement ... All supervisory personnel of the Department must make it unmistakably clear -- by deed as well as by word -- that it is the policy of the Department to vigorously support the letter and the spirit of affirmative action for equal employment opportunity."

To be sure that the major field offices understood the need to obtain results in the EEO program, agency personnel officers reviewed the program in 10 field conferences during October, November, and December 1965. The Executive Assistant to the Secretary, the Assistant to the Secretary for Civil Rights and the Director of Personnel also stressed equal employment at seven regional civil rights meetings held recently.

Contract Compliance Policy -- Federal Regulations provide that each contract of $10,000 or more let by Department agencies must contain a nondiscrimination clause pursuant to Executive Order 11246, which assures that the contractor will provide equal employment opportunity. There are approximately 7,500 USDA contractors covered by this Executive Order.

B. Actions

The Office of Personnel worked with agency representatives to coordinate recruitment of minority personnel. The group distributed copies of a directory of Negro Colleges and Universities to Department agencies and is considering alternate means of reaching minority group applicants and proposals to assure all agencies adequate information on qualified minority group applicants.

Agencies were encouraged to utilize the resources of the National Urban League Skills Bank. Letters were sent to 147 displaced Negro teachers on recommendation of the Citizens Advisory Committee.

The Department published "Occupational Summary -- Best Employment Opportunities in Agencies of the Department of Agriculture" as source material to aid in the recruitment of minority group individuals. Copies of the booklet and examination announcements listed are going to all predominately Negro colleges and universities.

Teams visited four headquarter cities for audit conferences and information on progress, conditions and attitudes.

Agencies have greatly expanded their recruitment contacts with predominately Negro high schools and colleges.

They have also furnished detailed plans for progress in the Equal Employment Opportunity Program from which an overall Department plan was prepared.

In the area of equal employment among USDA contractors, the newly established Contract EEO Management Division reviewed, as directed by the Office of Federal Contract Compliance, 15 contractors with 100 or more employees and no Negro employees, located in areas with at least 4 percent Negro population. Plans for 1966 include on-site compliance reviews of 50 percent or 315 contractors or subcontractors employing 100 or more and a number of multiplant firms employing less than 100 per facility.

The Contract Compliance unit also has responsibility for processing complaints of employment discrimination filed against covered contractors. Since 1963 they have received a total of 23 cases of employment discrimination against Department contractors. Eight cases have been sent to the Office of Federal Contract Compliance for final disposition, since September 1965. In each case negotiations resulted in corrective action by the employer.

C. Results

For the year ending June 30, 1965, Negro employment in the Department increased 41.4 percent over the previous year. In actual numbers this reflects an increase from 3,057 to 4,324 or 4.5 percent of the total employees in the Department. There is progress in promotion -- an increase of 23 percent in Negroes holding GS-5 to GS-11 positions and an increase of 22 percent in positions for GS-12 to GS-18. A June report showed that formal training for minority groups in fiscal year 1965 approximated the proportion of these groups to the total full-time employee population, and the plans for 1966 will increase the numbers to be trained. Current plans and actions should assure continuation of this accelerated trend toward increased utilization of minority group employees.

ASCS -- Not recorded in the Federal Employment story are the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service's efforts to increase employment at the county office level. Prior to January 3, 1965, Negroes had not been employed in permanent positions in county ASCS offices in the South and only a few Negroes had been appointed to temporary positions each year by county committees. Today there are 27 Negroes permanently employed in county offices and field positions in the southern States. During the year 1965, a total of 5,267 Negroes were employed in temporary positions in ASC county offices throughout the South and at the end of December 1965 there were 426 Negroes in pay status in temporary positions at the county level. During 1966 the agency will further emphasize increasing minority group employment in permanent county office positions.

PART IV -- ACTIONS TAKEN TO ESTABLISH METHODS FOR REVIEW AND EVALUATION OF IMPLEMENTATION OF THE EQUAL OPPORTUNITY POLICY IN DEPARTMENT PROGRAMS

A. Committee Appointment

The Secretary appointed a Departmental Committee for Program Review and Evaluation to establish continuing review and evaluation of Department programs which will assure that these programs are efficiently accomplishing the objectives of Congress on a completely nondiscriminatory basis.

B. Committee Actions and Agency Plans

As directed, the Committee on Program Review and Evaluation conducted extensive meetings with all agencies of the Department that provided any service to the public to design evaluation systems which would measure quantitative and qualitative service to minority groups. As a result, seven agencies have completed plans and of these agencies three (FHA, FCIC and SCS) have obtained initial data from the field. The Rural Electrification Administration is revising a previously rejected questionnaire to resubmit to the Bureau of the Budget. Several other agencies are able to compile useful ancillary statistics.

Apart from the agency evaluation procedure, the Office of the Inspector General independently evaluated agency implementation of equal employment opportunity and civil rights policies.

SECTION TWO

"No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." (Title VI, Section 601, Civil Rights Act of 1964)

Ten agencies of the Department have programs which provide assistance through, in the language of Title VI, recipients to beneficiaries. These agencies having indirect programs subject to the Civil Rights Act are: ARS, ASCS, C&MS, CSRS, FCS, FHA, FES, FS, REA, and SCS.

Realization of the intent of Title VI -- nondiscriminatory service, available to all and utilized by all -- is accomplished by three approaches: (1) Requiring the recipient of Federal assistance to sign a statement (an assurance) saying he is not discriminating or, in the case of a continuing program which is not in compliance, requiring a detailed plan for coming into compliance, (2) reviewing the activity of the recipient to be sure that the recipient is, in fact, not discriminating and (3) providing information to the public on the applicability of the Civil Rights Act to USDA programs and the public's right to complain.

The attached report summarized for the 10 agencies involved the number of assurances required and received, the number of compliance reports received, and the number of compliance field reviews conducted by the agency and the State agencies. The report shows that agencies have obtained nearly all required assurance and that most agencies have begun to review the recipients of assistance. In those few cases where assurances are outstanding or where noncompliance remains, the Department will move to initiate hearings. To date the Department has gone to only one hearing and this one case was settled without the full formal proceedings.

ADDENDUM

In accordance with an earlier understanding, the Federal Extension Service has furnished a report of civil rights progress in the Cooperative Extension Services during 1965. The factual information presented in this report is largely a summary of reports of status of compliance furnished by those states which have not furnished assurances of compliance.

It is noteworthy that this report does not attempt to describe the employment situation within the Cooperative Extension Services. This is an area of real concern, however, and much effort will be expended in correcting abuses where they are found to exist.

The Extension program has a greater sociological impact than any of the other programs offered by the Department of Agriculture, and the program itself is implemented by the states under memoranda of understanding with the Department. For these two reasons, we may expect civil rights progress to be irregular at best and lacking altogether at worst.

CIVIL RIGHTS PROGRESS IN THE COOPERATIVE EXTENSION SERVICE
January 1, 1965 - December 31, 1965

The Cooperative Extension Service made rapid strides in 1965 toward full compliance with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

In one year of voluntary compliance, the 14 Southern States have overturned the traditional pattern of separate educational services for white and Negro rural people. Extension leaders in the South deserve praise for their many accomplishments in effecting changes in this complex problem area which involves the financial cooperation of county governments and the voluntary cooperation of many thousands of local unpaid leaders.

Compliance with the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was a primary goal of the Federal Extension Service in 1965. All FES staff members have been advised repeatedly of their responsibilities under the Act and have been kept informed of progress.

The FES Administrator held individual conferences with each Southern State Extension Director and his staff to help implement the new legislation most effectively. Requirements under the Act and the need for prompt aggressive action were discussed at five meetings of Southern State Directors.

Most of the adverse findings of the United States Commission on Civil Rights have been corrected. New complaints have been referred to the Office of Inspector General for thorough investigation. Teams of Federal Extension Service program leaders were sent into each of the 14 States in August 1965 to make a special review of civil rights progress, and to assist states in developing means of eliminating noncompliance.

Success in overcoming racial discrimination in Extension programs, as of December 31, 1965, as reported by the 14 Southern State Directors on January 15, 1966, is encouraging. Their reports consist of answers to 38 direct questions on compliance with the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The following accomplishments are especially noteworthy:

1. All of the 1,327 counties in these States prepared combined work plans for white and Negro clientele for 1966.

2. Mailing lists in all counties include all interested persons regardless of race, color, or national origin.

3. Distribution of publications and other information is made without regard to race.

4. Equal and integrated training opportunities and facilities are provided for all agents.

5. All State, district, and county staff conferences are held without discrimination.

6. Equal opportunities are provided for all 4-H Club members and leaders to participate on a nonsegregated basis in program activities at the State, district, and county levels in all but one of the 1,327 counties.

7. The same results were achieved in providing equal opportunities for all home economics and club members.

8. All farmers are given opportunity and encouraged to participate in Extension programs without segregation, except in one county.

9. About half (650) of the 1,327 counties have both white and non-white members on their program planning committees.

10. Extension agents conduct integrated training programs for local leaders of 4-H Clubs, home economics groups, and other organized groups in counties with both white and non-white leaders in all but two counties.

11. All persons have equal opportunities to participate in tours, field days, and other program activities on a nonsegregated basis in all but one county.

12. In only one county does Extension Service allow segregated meetings or permit speakers to appear on programs where the audience is segregated.

13. Of the 9 Southern States where exclusively Negro Extension staffs were located at predominantly Negro colleges, the Negro Extension staff has been combined with the white staff in five States and still remains separate in the other four.

14. Of the six States that have Extension Service planning or advisory committees at the State level, five are integrated.

15. Supplies, equipment, and other office facilities are provided without racial discrimination in all except one county.

16. All 14 States now assign workers without regard to race. Staffing changes have been made in all States to eliminate dual systems of supervision based on race.

17. Extension offices in all 14 States have provided staff training and orientation of Extension workers on policies and requirements of the Act and have adopted procedures and program reviews to guarantee continuing compliance.

18. The State Extension Director in each of the 14 States has assured the Department of Agriculture that Extension staff members will not work through organizations that discriminate on the basis of race.

    Some question still remains as to whether five of the States have properly disseminated information to the public on the policies and requirements of the Act.

    Also, a question remains as to whether four States have adequately notified organizations receiving Extension assistance that such assistance cannot be continued for organizations that discriminate on the basis of race.

19. One of the most significant achievements in Extension, and one that is easy to measure, is the consolidation of white and Negro county Extension offices. Of the 424 counties that have both white and Negro agents, 341 had completed housing of all employees without regard to race, color, or national origin. This total had been reached by April 15, 1966. Lack of local availability of housing is the major delaying factor in many of the remaining areas and each situation is being handled on an individual basis to achieve full compliance.

Report on the 1965 ASCS Community Committee Elections in Holmes County, Mississippi

In a recent letter to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, from us here in Holmes County F. D. P., there were several complaints mentioned concerning the conduct of the ASCS Community Committee elections. This fuller report will try to include those complaints previously mentioned plus all the irregularities we noticed during the conduct of the ASCS elections in Holmes County.

Taking an over-all view of the elections here in Holmes County, one prime irregularity stands out and seems to be the cause itself of great injustice and the source of other injustices flowing directly from it. No matter whether looking at the elections in time periods, such as November 2 to November 12, November 12 through November 17, or in categories such as Voters, Candidates, and Returns, or in any other way, this list of Eligible Voters - stands out as having caused the most trouble for fair participation in the elections.

Inaccuracy and Incompleteness of the Eligible Voter List as Compiled by the Holmes County ASCS Office:

After having some bit of trouble and several days' delay we finally obtained permission from Mr. McWilliams, County ASCS Office Manager, to see and make copies of the supposedly public record of eligible ASCS voters. At first he did not accept the rights of interested farmers to see that public record and then our people were delayed in copying the records because McWilliams said several communities were not completed, not totally compiled, not up-to-date. Mr. McWilliams used such reasons on the week-end before and on the very day of November 2, the day his office had to send out the first announcements-explanations of the elections to the voters.

After obtaining the lists, we noticed from our personal knowledge of Negro owners, tenants and sharecroppers, that hundreds of names were left off the lists. It is obvious that it is more difficult for a person to participate in the elections if he or she does not get the full and normal information at the proper time from the office. However, all those who were not on the lists we had on November 2 did not get the first notice from the office as was normal procedure. There are several hundreds of Negro farm owners in this county, and, especially in the Delta community where the Negroes obtained the land through federal government projects, a good number of these Negro farm owners own the land jointly with their wives. Notwithstanding this, all but about four or five of the Negro wives did not have their names appearing on the lists and therefore did not receive the information or separate ballot in the mail. Besides the extreme disenfranchisement of farmers' wives, there were a good many sharecroppers (tenants) left off the lists also. There were whole estates, inhabited by tenant farmers, which did not list any name other than the white owners.

Admittedly most of our information and knowledge concerns the accuracy of the lists of Negro voters. Considering how bad these lists are, there is not really a good basis for assuming the accuracy for the whites either. By comparing the lists we obtained at the first of November with lists that McWilliams made available after December 2, we found in one community (Ebenezer) that over fifty names for white people had been added; this is out of a total of a little over 300 eligible voters, according to the final lists. Rough though this is, it gives some indication of the inaccuracy of McWilliams' list.

Difficulty in Adding Names to the Eligible Voter Lists:

Flowing directly from this first injustice came the second large obstacle to Negro participation in these elections - the great difficulty Negroes had in obtaining the right to information and a ballot. In this section we must of necessity speak of the experience only of Negroes; our information on the procedures whites had to go through to get added to the voters lists is nil. It is our suspicion, considering the past history of the Holmes County ASCS office regarding equality of whites and Negroes (see December 1964 report of Holmes County ASCS elections of 1964 by Mary Brumder and 1965 Report of the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights on "Equal Opportunity in Farm Programs") and considering the present atmosphere of the office and difference in service to whites and Negroes, that the whites did not have the same difficulty, that they probably had to do little more than mention addition by phone if not less. As has been said, it is very difficult for us to obtain information of this sort, however; an outside investigation would be necessary.

Although the normal procedure for making corrections to the office's list is to bring properly formed proof of eligibility to the office, this procedure assumes a good deal of accuracy in the original lists. Considering the extreme degree of innacuracy in the lists, the several hundreds of Negroes who were left off just from our own knowledge, this procedure becomes cumbersome and extremely unfair. To get anywhere near the total number of these left off to come into the office assumes some outside agency working to inform these people of their rights. This is extremely unfair since it is the responsibility of the office to inform the people of their rights in the first place and the office is in a better position with its access to files and county records than anyone to inform the people. By leaving the names off the lists, the office forces the proof of eligibility to become a large burden to be borne by the voter himself, rather than accepting the responsibility of finding and informing all eligible voters. By leaving so many names off, the whole procedure becomes extremely unfair (and probably discriminatory when the procedures for whites are discovered).

Because of the extreme degree of inaccuracy, Mr. Ralthus Hayes, Delta community farmer owner and operator and Holmes County F. D. P. Chairman, made complaints in person to the Washington office or the Department of Agriculture during his visit in Washington from November 16 through November 19. His complaints were similar to the ones above and the Washington office understood and attempted to redress the wrong by ordering the issuance of Challenge Ballots to anyone requesting a ballot. The Mississippi ASCS Office was sent an immediate order to direct the county offices to give out Challenge Ballots to whoever applied. This brought the burden of proof of eligibility back into the proper place - the ASCS office: yet this still, to be entirely just, required some outside agency other than ASCS to work at rounding up and informing people of their rights (this becomes a difficult procedure for anyone other than a Federal agency, for you are dealing with trying to inform Negro sharecroppers who live on white men's plantations - a dangerous situation.) Also, before this order could be actually applied and implemented it was already November 22, the date the ASCS office mailed out the official ballots However, notwithstanding the inadequacies of Washington's attempt to correct the situation, this correction still did not succeed, for it assumed that there would be a desire on the part of county offices to follow the orders of their supervisors in Washington; considering the manner in which the Holmes County ASCS Office handled the Challenge Ballots, the office had little desire to follow such orders.

Difficulty in Obtaining Challenge Ballots:

As hinted above, the Holmes County ASCS Office effectively ignored the order to issue Challenge Ballots. Since the burden of rounding up all the eligible voters who had been left off of the lists and failed to receive any information on the elections and also by this time had also missed the mailing of the official ballots, the F. D. P. did what it could in the job of informing the disenfranchised of their rights. It must be emphasized that it is a difficult and unjust burden placed on the Negro voter when it is required that he request and/or complain to the white man (in the ASCS office) before he can obtain his ballot - especially when others are receiving them by mail. It takes a courageous and protesting man to stand up and demand his ballot when it is obvious that the white man, either the ASCS manager or his "owner," has kept him from getting his ballot in the normal manner. Yet, the F.D.P. managed to encourage quite a few Negroes to go down after November 22 to get a Challenge Ballot. And, it was here that the ASCS office ignored the Washington order of November 19 and refused to issue Challenge Ballots. Those strong souls who did go up to request the ballot were still forced to prove their eligibility. Wives who were part land owners were required to show their Homestead Exemption papers and, if that did not yield the proper information, they had to make another trip to get their deeds or titles to the land. Sharecroppers were required to get a statement from their owner on their own. The concept of a Challenge Ballot was destroyed.

Thus, the injustices flowing from the incompleteness of McWilliams' original lists continued. It was not until the evening of November 30, when United States Congressman Joseph Resnick of New York happened to be in Holmes County, that some change in the ASCS office's attitude toward Challenge Ballots occurred. Although Mr. Resnick's appearance was quite unprepared for, there were seventy-five to one hundred Negroes gathered to meet him. When Mr. Resnick heard about the difficulties in the ASCS election he telephoned Mr. McWilliams and in very strong language informed him of his obligation to issue Challenge Ballots. In answer to Mr. McWilliams' expressions of disbelief that there was disatisfaction about the ballots, Mr. Resnick gave McWilliams the names of persons eligible to vote who had not received ballots and even put several of the persons who were having difficulty getting ballots onto the phone to speak to McWilliams personally. Resnick suggested that McWilliams take the names and addresses of these same twenty-five or thirty people and immediately mail them Challenge Ballots; he also considered the fact that there were but two days until the December 2 deadline for getting marked ballots back into the ASCS office and indicated the necessity of getting some kind of extenstion to correct the injustice involved.

Despite the fact that the ASCS Office did issue out the Challenge Ballots during the two days following Resnick's visit, the over-all effect on the disenfranchisement was limited. There were but some thirty names at most to McWilliams on the evening of November 30 and there was a relatively small number of people even aware of the chance visit of this Congressman and the new development. With such limited time remaining, it was difficult to spread the word and convince any good percentage of the disfranchised that they would finally be able to obtain a ballot if they would go back to the ASCS office. Those that had given their names over the phone received the ballots in the mail too late to return them before the deadline, and in some cases they even received them after the deadline itself. No allowance was made for these late Challenge Ballots and no extension of time was accorded. Realizing this many were discouraged from even returning the late ballots to the office.

Those who did go out of their way greatly even had difficulty. In one case, at least, a woman who had given her name over the phone on Tuesday evening, November 30, decided, when she didn't receive the balloton Wednesday, December 1, that she had better make a special trip (some 20-odd miles) to the ASCS office to and mark her ballot there. She was told that a ballot had been mailed out to her already and she should go home and wait for it; even though there are simple and thoroughly proper procedures for issuing "Second" Ballots, it was only with great difficulty and courage on her part that she managed to get a ballot at the office.

Irregularities in the Nominations by Petition:

Although compared with last year's extreme difficulty wrought by an ASCS Office which obviously did not care to accept, much less encourage, nominations by petition (See 1964 ASCS Report), this year's nominations by petition went relatively smoothly. Yet, it must be emphasized that the amount of success local farmers (Negro) have in participating in ASCS elections is directly proportional to the amount of time and effort devoted by workers outside of the ASCS agency; the ASCS (i. e. the Federal government) does not do an adequate job which would alone encourage and inform enough to result in well-participated-in, democratic elections; for any degree of successfully democratic elections, active workers, interested in promoting participation and democracy in these elections, must be assumed to be existing outside the ASCS agency.

Again the injustice of having inaccurate and incomplete eligible voters lists affected the fully just operation of this portion of the election. Petitions for nomination have to be signed by six or more eligible voters; however, the question here in Holmes County was not,'does a signer fulfill the eligibility requirements?' but rather 'is this signer's name on Mr. McWilliams' inaccurate list.' One nominee by petition (Negro) was disqualified as nominee because his petition was supposedly not signed by six eligible voters, however, some of those who signed were "eligible" but not on McWilliams' list and, from the foregoing statements about difficulty in getting added to the list (Negro), it can be seen that this was not entirely fair. That same nominee turned in his petition for nomination by the deadline, Friday, November 12, yet he did not receive notification of his disqualification in time to appeal the decision. A notice dated November 15 was not received by him until the evening of November 17, the very day appeals had to be made. Another nominee was disqualified because of nomination by the wrong community. This same Negro nominee had extreme trouble last year and was also disqualified at that time; he has unsuccessfull tried to get the confusion about his community cleared up. Though his only marketing card has the indication of one particular community he has never been able to get a clear indication of proper residence community, if it is different.

On Friday, November 12, the one Negro community committeeman in the county attended a meeting in McWilliams' office wherein it was stated that there was going to be an extension of time for getting nominating petitions in, presumably because few or no whites had been nominated by petition. No notification of this extension was made public knowledge, and when Mr. McWilliam was finally available to comment on the matter the following Tuesday, he denied that any extension had been given. Although it is usually customary to believe on faith the statements of officials, it is very difficult for anyone familiar with the realities of the situation now and the past history of discrimination to have such faith.

Irregularities in the Official ASCS Ballot:

Although we have been unable to get official information concerning number of whites nominated onto the ballot by petition, we strongly suspect that few if any whites were put on the ballot this way. [illegible] If this is true, it is very curious that in every one of the nine ASCS communities the ballots contained exactly, no more and no less than, five white candidates. Considering the following statements about percentages of Negro and white, the fact that the whites (i.e. the committee now in power) find it difficult to accept and in fact do everything possible to avoid accepting the reality that Negroes outnumber the whites as they do, do deserve to have a seat on the committee becomes evident by the nomination of 5 and only 5 whites.

Throughout the elections period (November 2 through December 2) there seemed to be confusion over the regulation concerning nomination of candidates in such a way that they are proportional (racially) to the population. It was never clear whether the percentage was based upon population or ASCS farmers in the county. McWilliams once stated publicly that the percentage that had to be followed was not population in the county but Negro-white farmers in the county and that that percentage was 41% white - 59% Negro for Holmes County. We assume this is a readily available statistic. However, the committee nominating for the ballot ended up not following this figure. The percentages varied greatly from one community to the next. [illegible] The ballots in some communities had percentage of Negroes as high as 72% Negro (that is the proper population percentage) and as low as 54% Negro in another. What looks like may have been done is to change the percentage to attempt to be proportioned by farmers within the community. This statistic does not seem to be readily available and considering the inaccuracy of Mr. McWilliams' lists of eligible voters it would be extremely questionable and unfair to use those lists to determine the percentage, even if that was acceptable under the regulation in question.

Irregularities in Counting the Ballots:

The opening and counting of the ballots of December 6 had been announced in ASCS literature as being open to all interested public, yet when fifteen to twenty-five Negroes showed up at the ASCS office on the morning of the sixth they were informed that there was only room for four observors in the room where the committee had arranged to work. In order to get to the room where the counting was going on, one had to go past the desks and swinging gate in the front of the office and there the secretaries in the office kept a grudging eye to make sure only four were in at the time. The committee required that those observing give their name and address and this was written down by McWilliams (this seemed true only of the Negroes and the one white civil rights worker observing). Later during the day (and also the next when they still were counting the ballots) a few whites drifted in to find out how the returns were proceeding. They did not seem to have difficulty in gaining access to the back of the office, getting past the front gate, even though there were already four of us observing. The whites stood in the hall and doorway and listened and observed and were not required to give their names and addresses.

Although the committee did take care to read out the names of those envelopes they were not opening and counting, they gave no public reading of the names of those they had deemed qualified and acceptable to open and count. It was only after difficult and prolonged questioning that we were able to find out that there could be made available after the counting a list which showed the date each ballot was returned and therefore by deduction supposedly would yield the information on whose ballots had been counted.

Although the election returns have still not been pronounced as official by the ASCS office, presumably to make decisions about the unopened ballots, a few statements about those ballots which they did not open and count seem in order. As of now (and the date of the counting) no provision was made to treat the late-postmarked Challenge Ballots (even though none of them were issued before December 1) in any way different from late-postmarked ballots which had been sent out normally on November 22. As of now (and the date of the counting), the committee would not consider opening and counting any ballot that had been signed in any way different from the way the ASCS Office had printed the name onto the envelope. Thus, if the ASCS Officer had made some mistake in the spelling or name of the voter, when that voter tried to correct the error by writing his name as normally written, he was penalized by having his ballot left unopened and uncounted. In all the written instructions add the oral instruction received by ASCS office staff, illiterates were led to believe that the proper procedure for them to follow in casting a ballot was to make a mark and then get a witness to sign his own (the witness' names). However, when it came time to open the ballots, the committee did not open and would not count ballots by illiterates where the witness had not also printed the name of the voter on the ballot-envelope. In a similar manner to the rest, ballots were left unopened and uncounted by the committee which had--the printed name of the voter instead of the written signature (in such cases where they the committee, had access in the office to a sample of the said voter's written signature. Where the committee did not have a sample of the normal signature of the voter who printed, that vote was accepted and counted. Since the requirement for written signatures can only be made to avoid fraud, it seems that instead of rejecting these printed names, the committee should check with the voter to find out if he did indeed print.

Upon seeing the havoc and injustices wrought by having incomplete and inaccurate voters lists, it seems that this election can only be considered unfair. It needs be re-run as soon as the ASCS Office gets its lists accurate. Considering the resources at the disposal of the ASCS Office in form of access to Tax Assesor's records, Chancery Clerk's records, it should not be difficult to find the truly accurate list of owner's and joint owners (Negro wives); and considering the possibilities of using not only the word of the landlord about his tenants but also the records of gin receipts and seed purchases which indicate both the owner's and the sharecropper's name, it should not be difficult to compose an accurate list of tenants.

Considering the discrimination, favoritism, and confusion reigning over the committee's nomination of candiates for the ballot, it seems proper to suggest that the county committee (and community committee) have only such nominating power as will asure six names being on the ballot and assure proper racial proportions (of course, the definition of what the racial balance of the ballot must be proportional to - whether county population or what - must be made clear). By following this suggestion of nominations only by petition fuller, more democratic participation will be insured.

WHAT YOU SHOULD KNOW ABOUT THE ASCS ELECTIONS IN YOUR COMMUNITY

WHY IS ASCS IMPORTANT?

Because the ASCS gives out your crop allotment.

WHO CAN VOTE IN THE ASCS ELECTION?

Any man or woman who owns or rents a farm, or who is a tenant or sharecropper on someone else's farm can vote.

You do not have to be able to read and write to vote.

You do not have to be registered at the Court House to vote in ASCS.

There is no racial discrimination in this program. You can vote if you are Negro or white or any other race.

IF YOU WORK FARMS IN DIFFERENCT COMMUNITIES IN THE COUNTY, CAN YOU VOTE IN BOTH COMMUNITIES?

No. You can only vote one time. You may choose which community you want to vote in if you work two farms.

WHO CAN RUN FOR ASCS COMMITTEE ELECTIONS?

Anybody who can vote in ASCS elections can be a candidate for ASCS committeeman. But, the candidate must live in the community he is a candidate from.

HOW DO YOU RUN FOR THE ASCS COMMITTEE ELECTIONS?

There are two ways for a man or woman to have their name on the ballot:

1. One way is for the man or woman to have their name put on the ballot by the County ASCS Committee. Usually the people put on the ballot by the County ASCS Committee do not work for you. They work for the other man.

2. You can put your OWN candidates on the ballot by PETITION. That way you can be sure that they will work for you.

HOW DO YOU PUT CANDIDATES ON THE BALLOT BY PETITION?

You can make your own petition or use the one attached to this notice. All you need on the petition is a statement saying that those people who sign the petition want to nominate a person (the petition must have his whole name) as your candidate for the ASCS voters in his ASCS community.

You can sign as many petitions as you want.

Petitions must be turned into the county ASCS office at least 25 days before the day the election ballots are due at the office. In Alabama that is on the 25th of July.

WHAT IS AN ASCS COMMUNITY?

Each county is divided up by the ASCS County Committee into ASCS communities which are NOT the same as the communities people live in. They are much bigger and will include many rural communities. Sometimes they will cut a rural community in half. The ASCS County Committee is supposed to write you a letter telling you what community you are in. If you have any questions about what community you are in, you should ask at the ASCS County office.

WHAT ARE THE TWO MOST IMPORTANT STEPS TO REMEMBER IN AN ASCS ELECTION?

1. The FIRST important step in an ASCS election is to nominate YOUR OWN friends and leaders by PETITION. The easiest way to do this is by calling a meeting of farmers in your community and let the meeting decide who to nominate by petition. Then, at the meeting have the petitions signed and have someone carry them the next day to the County ASCS office. If you cannot get them signed that night, have someone carry them around the next day until you have 10 or 12 signatures.

2. The SECOND important step to remember in an ASCS election is CANVASSING.

   ASCS voting is new to many people. They will be getting letters in the mail from the ASCS Committee explaining how to vote. But they may not pay any mind to these letters since they have never voted before. It is up to you and your meeting of farmers to go around to every farmer in the ASCS community and explain to him or her how important the ASCS elections are and to see that he votes.

   One of the biggest reasons many ASCS votes are lost is because people do not sign their name correctly on the outside envelope. Your canvasser can help by showing everybody how to vote, (but of course he cannot vote for them) and be the witness who helps the voter who cannot read and write.

   Your canvasser should also explain that if you only like one or two of the men who are running as ASCS committeemen, you do not have to vote for 5 people. You can vote for only those people you trust.

IS THERE ANYTHING ELSE TO REMEMBER IN AN ASCS ELECTION?

Yes. Remember that if anybody tries to keep you from voting or tries to force you to vote for someone, or threatens you with violence or loss of credit if you vote, he is BREAKING THE LAW.

You should report all violations of the law in a simple letter to:

The Secretary of Agriculture
United States Department of Agriculture
Washington, D. C.

And the National Sharecroppers Fund can help if you will send a letter telling about your problems to:

The National Sharecroppers Fund

To advise county offices of State committee determinations relative to committee elections.

2 DETERMINATIONS

The State committee made determinations noted below relative to elections.

A Community committee elections shall be held by mail.

B Final date by which ballots must be postmarked or returned in person is August 16, 1966.

C Ballots are to be tabulated August 22, 1966.

D County Convention.

1 The date for the convention is August 30, 1966.

2 Nominations shall be by secret ballot.

E Newly elected committeemen will take office on September 1, 1966.

3 COMMENTS

Two copies of Handbook 7-CA, County and Community Committee Elections, are enclosed. (Exhibit 4 of 7-CA provides a calendar to follow in meeting time limits and schedules.) Additional copies of instructions and forms will be forwarded at an early date.

4 ACTION

Each office manager should review 7-CA with the county committee and plan for the conduct of elections as provided therein. Farmer fieldmen will assist county offices in connection with this.

TO: NSF/RAP Field Representatives

FROM: Jac Wasserman, Field Director

I am sending you, under separate cover, a "Manual on ASCS Elections" which you can adopt for use in your state; the ASCS County and Community Committee Elections Handbook (7-CA); and an informational circular "What You Should Know About the ASCS Elections in Your Community." This can be duplicated for general distribution in the counties and communities in your state. Please note that the last sentence on page 1 gives the last date petitions must be submitted in Alabama. This sentence should be substituted with the last date for submission of petitions in your State.

I would suggest that you arrange a state-wide meeting of farm leaders from all the counties in your state where the number of Negro farm operators are 30% or more of the total. If possible this meeting should be held at least six weeks prior to the last date for submission of petitions to place candidates on the ballot. You can obtain information on the number of Negro and white farm operators in each county from the Agricultural Census for your State. Mike Kenney or I will be available to attend and speak at your meeting and we will also arrange to have an ASCS representative from Washington and from your State at the meeting to explain the new election procedures and to show their film slides.

Additional copies of these materials are available on request.

P. S. I have also enclosed a report on the 1965 elections in Holmes County, Mississippi. You should make every effort to keep a record of all irregularities and any acts of violence and intimidation so that you can prepare a similar report after your elections are held --in addition to reporting such violations immediately to the FBI; to the ASCS Washington and State offices; to William M. Seabron, Assistant to the Secretary, USDA; to the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights; and to our office.

ASCS ELECTION MANUAL

This pamphlet is a suggested plan for organizing an ASCS election campaign. It is based on experience from 1964 and 1965 in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama and North Carolina. You may want to do things differently but these basic ideas should help you to have a WINNING campaign.

FIRST

The first thing to do is form an election committee in your ASCS community. This committee should be made up of farmers in your ASCS community. It is important to remember that ASCS communities are NOT the same as your rural or church communities. Usually the ASCS communities are larger and cover 3 or 4 rural communities. Very often the ASCS community boundary lines cut real communities in half.

THEN

After the election committee is formed, it needs to do three things:

1. The election committee should send a group to the county ASCS office to get a list of the eligible voters in your community from the ASCS rolls.

2. The committee should also ask the county ASCS office for an ASCS county map so they can know which farmers are in what community, at the time of the present election.

3. The election committee should find out when the petitions and ballots must be turned into the ASCS office, and when the ballots and sample ballots will be mailed out.

4. The election committee should also request sample ballots at this time from the ASCS County Office.

THEN

Call your first planning meeting for the whole ASCS community. The first meeting is just to get started. You should plan to hold meetings once a week in each ASCS community until the elections, starting about 6 weeks before the day the ballots are due back at the ASCS office. It is a good idea to hold these weekly meetings in different churches or schools or homes so that more people will hear about them and be able to come.

At the first meeting you should explain how important the ASCS elections are because the ASCS committees give out the extra crop allotments, measures land and determines the soil bank payments. You should explain that they are Federal elections and all farmers, large or small, white or black, owners, renters, tenants or sharecroppers are supposed to vote in these elections.

After people understand the purposes of the elections you should explain that in the past many sharecroppers, tenants, and other small farmers have been left out of the elections. Then read the list of eligible voters in your community that you got from the ASCS office to see if all the people at your meeting have their name on that list. If some people at your meeting are eligible and do not have their names on your community ASCS list, one member of the election committee should write their names down on a separate piece of paper and arrange to go with them to the ASCS County office to get their names on the eligible voters list. People who know sharecroppers and tenants who are not on the list should give their names so an investigation can be started.

Finally, at this first meeting you should ask for volunteers to work as canvassers and precinct Captains for the ASCS elections. Usually it is easiest to ask for one volunteer from each road in a community. He is responsible for contacting all the farmers on his road or on roads near where he lives. Also, it makes it easier on everyone if each Church community has one precinct Captain who helps the canvassers and who the canvassers report to. The Captain is a member of the election committee.

A second meeting should be arranged before you adjourn the first meeting. A subcommittee should be chosen to visit the ASCS County Office Manager to invite him to speak at the next meeting. They should also invite him to show slides which the United States Department of Agriculture has prepared explaining the ASCS elections. If he says he cannot come, this should be reported to the State Director of ASCS and to the National Office of ASCS.

The canvassers should be prepared to canvass each member of their district to make sure that they come to the meeting.

And, IT IS VERY IMPORTANT that the canvassers make a list of each farmer, renter, sharecropper, or tenant in their district so they can find out if people have been left off the ASCS list.

THEN AT THE SECOND MEETING

The ASCS County Office Manager will speak and explain the ASCS election, if he comes. If he does not come, somebody who is familiar with the ASCS elections should explain the elections again because you will have many new people at this second meeting.

After the elections are explained, allow a long period for questions so that everybody gets a chance to ask whatever question he has.

This is now a good time to tell people that they should be thinking about who they want to represent them on the Committee so they can nominate them at the next meeting. (It is always good to plan what you are going to do at the next meeting so people will want to come.)

THEN AT THE THIRD MEETING

You will have to begin by explaining the ASCS elections again. Thi is good because some people do not understand everything after hearing it only once. Everyone should be asked if he has any questions he wants to ask.

Then the group should democratically decide who they want to nominate for the elections. At this time it should be explained again that usually all the names put on the ballot by the ASCS committee were not democratically selected. The only way to make sure people on the committee do what you want is to nominate them yourselves and make sure they are elected. Then it is important to remember that no more than 5 people should be nominated by petitions because you will split your vote with more than 5 people and make sure the other man wins.

After the group has democratically decided who they want to nominate, they should get petitions signed for those people. Each petition must have at least 6 signatures of eligible voters in the ASCS community. But it is a good idea to get 12 signatures because the ASCS offices sometimes refuses to honor all of the signatures. You can make your own petition. It just needs to say something like:

We nominate_____for ASCS committeeman for the_____community.

The petition should then be signed with the names and addresses of at least six people from the same community.

THE NEXT MEETINGS ARE VERY IMPORTANT. THIS IS WHEN YOU PLAN YOUR STRATEGY AND PRACTICE VOTING. DEPENDING ON HOW GOOD YOU DO THIS PART OF THE PLAN, YOU WILL WIN OR LOSE THE ELECTION.

AT THE FOURTH MEETING

You must do the following things:

1. Make sure that every voter knows that he should vote only for the people put on the ballot by petition. Each voter should understand that a vote for the other man means that the other man will win. You must vote only for those people nominated by you.

2. Each voter should also understand that if you have less than 5 of your own people on the ballot by petition, you should vote for only your own candidates. You do not have to vote for 5 candidates. If you have only placed 2 candidates on the ballot by petition, you should vote only for them.

3. The best way to make sure that everybody in your community knows exactly how to vote and whom to vote for is to have them practice voting at your 4th meeting with sample ballots which you made up after seeing the sample ballots from the ASCS office.

4. Then your canvassers should be ready to go from house to house to help the people in his district practice if they did not make it to the meeting. People should fill out as many sample ballots as they need to make sure that the people know how to do it.

By now you are probably having your meetings once a week on the same night. People will be used to coming to meetings. You can announce that at the next meeting there will be more time to practice and that the final plans will be made to make sure of VICTORY.

THEN AT THE FIFTH MEETING

Make sure that all of your canvassers have a list of all the voters in their district. This is called a check-list. They should carry this check-list around with them beginning the day the ballots arrive by mail. At each house they should make sure that the farmer or sharecropper has voted. They check off his hame on their check list after he has voted. They must go around every day until each man in their community has been checked off.

The canvassers should be able to read and write so they can help those farmers vote who cannot read and write. They must understand that not only do they have to sign their own name to outside envelope, but that they must print the voter's name next to his "X".

If the area is well organized, people can come to a meeting and mark their ballots at that time.

At this meeting you might want to discuss whether or not it would be best to have people hold their ballots back until the day before they are due so that the other side cannot know how strong your vote will be and have time to run out and scrape up some extra votes to beat you with.

THEN THE SIXTH MEETING SHOULD BE DURING THE VOTING PERIOD

The canvassers should give their reports and plans should be made to have emergency workers canvass to see that late voters vote and carry their own ballots to the office, if necessary, to make sure they are in.

At this meeting you should select a committee who will be at the place the ballots are opened and counted so that you can be sure that the ballots are counted fairly. Announce that any interested person can attend the vote counting. Then encourage everyone to attend. The more people you have there the better chance you have of having an honest election.

BUT BE SURE TO ASSIGN some people to go so that you are sure you are represented at the vote counting.

Then be sure to call a meeting for AFTER the election to review what happened. This will be your VICTORY meeting. If you have to protest you should choose a committee to do the protesting in the name of the community.

NOW THAT WE HAVE FINISHED THE STEP BY STEP SUGGESTIONS FOR THE ELECTION CAMPAIGN WE WOULD LIKE TO REMIND YOU ABOUT THREE VERY IMPORTANT THINGS:

1. You cannot win the election unless all your eligible voters are on the ASCS list. You must begin working on getting all your voters on the eligible voter list at the very beginning of the campaign and you will probably have to work on this problem for the whole 6 weeks.

2. If you have trouble getting your candidates on the ballot by petitinn you can either boycott the election, or you can conduct a write-in campaign. Write-in campaigns are very difficult, but possible. The ballots must have spaces for write-in names. Have your meeting decide which names are written in and then you practice writing those names in just like you practice for the regular voting. Sometimes people spell wrong and it is harder to get them to write in names than it is to have them mark an X on the ballot.

3. Keep a record of everything you do and everything that happens. If you need to protest the election, your case is much stronger if you have a record of everything that happened. For example, it is best to have a written letter inviting the ASCS office manager to your meeting when your committee goes to invite him. If he refuses, you have proof because you kept a copy of that letter.

   You should keep a list of all things done wrong in the election. If the ASCS office manager does not have the slides to show you, you should make a note of that. If you are kept out of watching the voting you should write down who was kept out, at what time they were kept out, who kept them out, and who saw all this happen. You should note any time that any ASCS official is discourteous to you and you should report any acts of discrimination that you might suffer.

   Also you should immediately report any acts of violence or intimidation in connection with the ASCS election to the nearest FBI office and by mail to:

   Secretary of Agriculture
   United States Department of Agriculture
   Washington, D. C.

   and copies of all complaints should be sent to

   The National Sharecroppers Fund
   5 Forsyth Street, N. W.
   Atlanta, Georgia 30303

   so that the National Sharecroppers Fund can follow-up on your complaints.

REMEMBER: You can win this election if you want to.

The only thing which can stop you from winning is not working.

If you work, you will win.

Dear Ed,

I enjoyed meeting you when I was in Atlanta with Shawn Boles last week. The U. S. Youth Council is particularly interested in co-operating with the SRC in action projects related to civil rights and poverty. I am glad you indicated an interest in the potential of this joint activity.

Reed Martin, National Affairs Director of the Youth Council, is working on several specific projects in connection with voter education and consumer affairs, by developing special educational materials. He plans to be in contact with Vern Jordan of the SRC in the near future, and I am confident that we will be able to develop a broad substantive program in the next months.

Reed and I plan to be in Atlanta before the end of the summer, and I hope we will be able to discuss our ideas more definitely then.

Sincerely,

Barry Jagoda

Dear Advisory Committee Member:

Now that the"dust from the Citizen Action Assembly has settled," we hope that you are ready to plan the next stages for citizen action to improve and to insure adequate health-welfare services in Georgia.

On June 8th, Wednesday, at 3:00 p.m., there will be a meeting of the Citizen Action Advisory Committee in the Conference Room of the Southern Regional Office of the National Urban League.

The purpose of this meeting is to discuss the Assembly Resolutions and Recommendations in order to ascertain what may be suitably and adequately handled by a state-wide committee; to decide how this committee shall be structured; and to consider what shall be the roles of the Advisory Committee and of the National Urban League.

We look forward to seeing all of the members at this most important meeting. If you are a representative for the president, chairman, or director of your organization or agency, and you are unable to attend, we request that the person whom you're representing attend.

Sincerely yours,

Jon J. Johnston
Advisory Committee Chairman

P.S. If you have not received a copy of the Assembly Resolutions and Recommendations, please let Revelle Pergament, Field Representative for Health and Welfare, Southern Regional Office, know so that a copy may be mailed to you prior to the June 8th meeting.

SLUM PLAN STIRS CONCERN IN HOUSE

URBAN PROBLEMS

Key Subcommittee Members Believe Johnson Program Needs Big Rise in Funds

3/7/66

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE Jr.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 6 — There is growing concern here that the proposed Demonstration Cities Program, for cleaning up slums, cannot work unless substantially more money is poured into it or exsting Federal programs.

Key members of the Housing subcommittee of the House Banking and Currency Committee have reached this stark and potentially troublesome conclusion. The subcommittee has heard a week of testimony on the much-publicized plan, on which President Johnson has pinned his hopes for improving city slum areas.

Under the President's plan, a city applying for Federal aid would select one or possibly two blighted neighborhoods and submit an over-all plan for their rejuvenation.

Plan Called Imaginative

The project would include housing for different income groups, with emphasis on those with lower incomes, as well as the health, education, welfare and other social services necessary to change the environment of the projects' residents.

Cities meeting a list of broad Federal criteria, including need and administrative capability, would be eligible for a share of $2.3-billion in Federal aid, spread over five years. They would also receive what Mr. Johnson described as "the complete array of all available Federal grants and urban aids in the fields of housing, renewal, transportation, education, welfare, economic opportunity and related program."

The Presidents' message submitting the proposal to congress said that 60 to 70 cities would be chosen to participate in the demonstration program.

A survey of subcommittee sentiment suggests that most members accept the Administration view that the plan is an imaginative and long overdue approach to solving slum problems.

But they fear $2.3-billion is not nearly enough to fulfill the program's promise.

Nor are they happy about the possible courses they believe are open to them if they try to match the capabilities of the program to the President's rhetoric.

Could Increase Funds

One course would be to increase funds for the program or, alternatively, the authorized levels of the many existing programs that are expected to be used as part of the demonstration cities plan. But they believe this course would involve enormous legislative difficulties and would invite criticism from the inflation-conscious Congress.

A second approach would be to reduce the number of cities involved in the plan. This would be equally risky because the program needs broad support on the House floor to pass.

A third course would be to revise downward the expectations of the plan by limiting the funds available to each participating city. But this might violate the Presidential dictum that the program be of sufficient magnitude to make "a substantial impact within the coming few years on the development of the entire city."

This largely unexpected concern has arisen in the last week for three main reasons.

First, the committee has been troubled by repeated testimony from mayors of large cities. The mayors have said that if the program, as Mr. Johnson promises, makes available to demonstration cities the "complete array of all available grants and aids," it will tend to divert these funds from communities that do not participate in the demonstration program.

Despite assertions to the contrary from Robert C. Weaver, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, committee members tend to agree that this would be true. To avoid such discrimination and diversion, they believe that the total Federal outlay for urban renewal and other Federal aid would necessarily have to be increased.

Secondly, some committee members believe that the problem of diversion or discrimination could be aggravated by a financing mechanism in the Administration bill. They believe it would tend to encourage cities competing for the demonstration funds to put still further pressure on existing Federal programs.

The bill says that the Government will pay 80 per cent of the local share of Federal grant-in-aid projects that are focused on the demonstration area.

Communities usually pay one-third of the net cost of urban renewal projects and the Government two-thirds. Under the bill, the Government would pick up 80 per cent of the community's old one-third share.

This mechanism, some committee members believe, would encourage communities to seek additional funds from a wide variety of Federal agencies to be able to enlarge the base on which their share of the demonstration program's money would be computed. Many of these agencies are already oversubscribed and short of cash.

Third, there is a growing belief in the committee and among housing experts here that the Administration badly underestimated the cost of certain important "social" aspects of the program. As a result, they believe the $2.3-billion requested by the President is grossly inadequate to do the kind of job he set out to do.

The $2.3-billion figure proposed by Mr. Johnson was arrived at by determining how much it would cost to meet certain physical and social goals in 60 to 70 cities and their subtracting from this the amount the cities would recover by selling to private owners the dwelling units constructed or rehabilitated under the program.

It is now clear, however, that the costs of providing a family with all the social services envisioned in the President's message were grossly miscalculated.

Accordingly, there are two separate moves afoot to "rationalize" the program, as one committee member put it. One is to enlarge greatly the $2.3-billion fund to meet the program's targets without increasing other Federal programs. The other is to keep the $2.3-billion figure and limit the number of cities involved.

URBAN PROBLEMS
AC 3/9/66

Eugene Patterson

Atlanta? Or Birmingham?

Why is Atlanta so eager for the people of Sandy Springs and Boulder Park to join the city? Atlanta certainly won't make any money on the deal for a while. It will have to pay through the nose, far in excess of what the new citizens pay in taxes, to extend its firehouses and sewers and rubbish routes and police patrols and streetlights and kindergartens into their neighborhoods.

Most simply, Atlanta thinks it would be worth the cost to bring such people into citizenship.

It needs the people—to involve themselves, to lead, to vote.

Such people moved across the mountain in Birmingham. Isolated in their suburbs, they saw the city, which they depended upon for their earnings, falter and stagnate and slide backward.

In Atlanta, vigorous and leaderlike citizens have lived inside the city, participating in it. And look at it. Atlanta wants to keep it that way. That's what's in it for the city.

The same thing is involved for the individual citizens of Sandy Springs and Boulder Park. Their fortunes are tied closely to Atlanta; their say will be important to its course. Yet individually, the homeowner who is being asked to vote himself into the city and pay higher taxes naturally wants to do some personal arithmetic before deciding.

The Constitution's Bruce Galphin, who was a mathematics major, has been doing some helpful computations editorially. Each household has its own figures, of course. But one of the more interesting examples Mr. Galphin came up with was this:

Say you own a $32,000 frame home (market value) on a $6,400 lot, inside the Sandy Springs Fire District but outside the sanitary district, with an annual water bill of $94.62, and you vote yourself into Atlanta in the May 11 referendum.

Your property tax would increase by $133.76. But your water bill would drop by $47.31; your sanitation charge would be cut $13 (and service increased); your straight fire insurance bill would be reduced by $40.20. That would reduce your net cost to an increase of $33.64 a year. "But that's not the whole story," Galphin pointed out.

The $133.76 tax increase is deductible from state and federal income tax (whereas those reduced items are not). If you are in the 20 per cent income tax bracket, this deductible tax increase reduces your income taxes by $26.75, leaving you a net cost of $6.89 for coming into Atlanta. Some people might even realize a net saving by voting themselves into the city.

Since tax time falls between now and the May 11 referendum, you may want to sharpen your pencil and do this side arithmetic as it affects your specific case. Such quiet consideration of facts will be the most reliable guide to an informed vote.

5/15/66

By WILL LISSNER

An exodus of about half a million white persons from New York City between 1960 and 1964 was disclosed in population estimates released yesterday by the City Health Department.

The exodus was only partly offset by an increase of less than 400,000 in nonwhites and Puerto Ricans during the period. The result has been a 2 per cent drop in the city's total population.

Whereas the city's population in 1960 as 7,706,300, in 1964 it was about 7,558,500.

"Nonwhite" is a census classification that includes Negroes, American Indians, Orientals, Malays and Eskimos. For practical purposes it signifies Negroes, as other nonwhites are few. "Puerto Ricans" is an ethnic group specified for census purposes by national origin; actually Puerto Ricans are 90 per cent white and 10 per cent Negro or Indian.

The figures present a picture of Negroes and Puerto Ricans moving into New York and whites fleeing the city. But population analysts point out that this is a misleading picture that arises from estimates achieved by studying a sample of 5,700 of the city's 2,751,000 households.

Flight to the Suburbs

What actually is happening, population experts say, is that the middle-class flight to the suburbs is continuing and nonwhites and Puerto Ricans are taking part in it. This leaves the older parts of the central city, which should hwve been condemned and razed years ago, with smaller populations. Similar movements are taking place in every metropolis and large city of the country.

The Health Department emphasized in the report that it could make no attempt to estimate migration into the city or out of it. What the department's population estimators did was ask what the natural increase in the city's population should have been in the four-year period, using birth and death rates and the 1960 population counts as guides.

The answer was that the city's total population should have increased nearly 300,000. The sample indicates that the total actually decreased by about 147,800 persons. This indicates that about 447,800 persons moved out.

The 447,800 is a net figure: it means that when the movement into the city and the movement out are balanced, the outgoers exceeded the newcomers by that number. Only by the more detailed estimates of the decennial census can such movements be traced out.

Probable Increase

The nonwhite community, with no movements in or out, would have increased by about 105,000 to 115,000 persons in the four-year period. The survey estimates it increased by about 285,000 persons. This indicates that 170,600 more nonwhites moved into the city than out of it.

The Puerto Rican population would have grown naturally by between 75,000 and 81,000 persons. The survey indicated the increase was about 98,600. This suggests that the net migration from Puerto Rico in the last few years was a minor factor, amounting at most to 17,600 persons.

Tiat these population movements represent changes by class rather than by ethnic group is indicated in the analysis of the city's population by boroughs.

"As the Puerto Rican population gained about 98,600, there was strong evidence that old as well as new residents in this group chose to establish homes in the Bronx, Brooklyn and Queens rather than Manhattan," the Health Department said. "The survey estimates that there were 24,600 fewer Puerto Ricans in Manhattan in 1964 than in 1960."

The drop in Manhattan's population cut across all ethnic groups. Manhattan lost 8.1 per cent of its population, dropping from 1,681,400 in 1960 to 1,545,000 in 1964. The loss in white persons was 114,400, or 10.9 per cent. In Puerto Ricans the loss was relatively greater, 11.1 per cent, reflecting a net movement out of 24,600. Nonwhites, on balance, increased by oly 700 persons, or 0.2 per cent.

7 Per Cent Drop in the Bronx

The population of the Bronx dropped from 1,410,000 to 1,306,000, a loss of 104,300 persons, 7.4 per cent of the total. About 195,600 whites were lost, a drop of 18.3 per cent in the borough's white population. Nonwhites rose by 21 per cent, a net gain of 33,30 persons; Puerto Ricans even more by 31.6 per cent, a net gain of 58,000 persons.

Brooklyn's population was practically unchanged, with a 500-person gain reflected in its 1964 total of 2,605,500. But the borough had a further loss of 209,700 in its white population total, 10.2 per cent of it. Nonwhites rose from 373,100 to 529,000, a gain of 41.8 per cent. Puerto Ricans rose 54,200 to 231,500, a gain of 30.6 per cent.

Local Sales Taxes Opposed by Group

AC 5/22/66

By WILLIAM O. SMITH

If Georiga cities and counties are to share in sales and excise taxes, these taxes should be collected by the state and rebated to the local governments, the Georgia Tax Research Foundation, Inc., says.

The foundaton said in a recent letter to city officials that under no circumstances should the General Assembly authorize local sales and excise taxes in addition to similar state taxes.

Such authorization "would bring about a very unsatisfactory, in fact, chaotic tax collecting condition in this state," the foundation said.

The independent public affairs service organization said it is possible, in fact, that cities and counties would derive more funds from a one-half cent sales tax increase collected by the state and rebated to them than an added 1 per cent collected locally.

The letter, written to Elmer George, executive director of th Georgia Municipal Association, followed recent suggestions that cities and counties should begin a campaign to obtain statutory authority from the General Assembly to levy local sales and excise taxes.

THE FOUNDATION said it has long opposed cities and counites getting into such tax fields but recognizes the "urgent need for additional sources of revenue for our local political subdivisions."

It was pointed out that several states permit locally levied sales and excise taxes and the result is a lack of uniformity "confusing to the public."

Some local governments levy the taxes and some do not, the foundation said. "The result is that consumers shop over the line into the county or over the line into an adjoining city, sometimes only a few blocks away, to make their purchases. Purchasers of large items such as automobiles, appliances, furniture and items such as gasoline, cigarettes, and even clothes and groceries, attempt, where possible, to shop in a nearby city or county area where such taxes are not levied."

"Unquestionably, few counties in Georgia would levy such sales and use taxes because of lack of administrative and collection facilities within the county government," the foundation said.

"Also, in counties such as Fulton County, having several municipalities, it is probable that some of the cities would not levy such taxes or, at least, have no uniformity in the levy. Therefore there would be a considerable rearrangement of the buying practices of the residents of such cities and counties."

THE FOUNDATION, in the letter written by general counsel William L. Norton Jr., said the cost of collecting such taxes are high and means the establishment of new tax collecting offices in most instances with a major part of such taxes spent in administrative costs.

"In any event, in conclusion, the Georgia Tax Research Foundation has uniformly taken the position that piece-meal enactment of tax measures designed to relieve certain problems confronting municipalities, counties, industry, consumers, is generally unwise," the letter said.

"GTRF feels that any major consideration of such complex matters as additional tax sources for cities and counties, the tax problems of our present taxation of manufacturing inventories, the tax problem of certain inequitable taxes upon industry, proposed increases in the Georgia sales and use tax, or modification or revision of the property tax, should be accompanied by a general mature review of and research into the over-all tax structure of this state before any enactment of any such and similar proposals.

Both Houses Will Take Up City and Transit Bills

8/15/66

By MARJORIE HUNTER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 14—Congress is scheduled to focus its attention this week on proposed legislation that could help shape the future of the cities and of the nation's vast transportation network.

Faced with a backlog of dozens of major bills on which action has not been completed, leaders in both houses have set up a heavy schedule for the week.

Both houses are expected to act on broadening the urban mass transit program set up last year.

In addition, the House is scheduled to take up bills dealing with automobile safety and highway safety, while the Senate acts on the Administration's demonstration cities plan for rehabilitating blighted urban areas.

There is still a strong possibility, however, that the House might have to scuttle its planned schedule to debate a more immediate transportation problem—the airline strike.

If current negotiations between the airlines and the striking machinists fail, a resolution to temporarily force strikers back to work may reach the House floor early in the week.

Long Debate Seen

The debate, legislative leaders have said, will likely tie up the House for days. The resolution has already passed the Senate.

Unless knocked off the calendar by the airline dispute, the auto safety bill is scheduled for House action on Tuesday. It was unanimously approved by the House Commerce Committee on July 25. A similar bill passed the Senate on June 24 by a vote of 76 to 0.

The bill, strongly endorsed by the White House, would require the establishment of Federal safety standards for all new motor vehicles sold for highway use after Jan. 31, 1968. Some "interim" standards would cover some 26 items, including impact-absorbing steering columns, rear window defrosting devices, front-seat headrests, interior padding, recessed knobs and handles, signaling devices for stopped vehicles and antiglare surfaces inside and out.

House action also is scheduled on a separate highway safety bill that would provide Federal grants to states to establish or strengthen highway safety programs.

Has Strong Support

The bill to broaden the urban mass transit program is scheduled to be acted on by the Senate tomorrow and by the House on Tuesday. It has strong support in both houses.

Under the bill, Federal outlays would be increased from the current $150-million to $175-million a year. The money is used for grants and loans to states and local governing bodies to assist public or private transportation companies in providing new or improved mass transportation services.

The Senate also has scheduled action early in the week on another urban-based measure, the Administration's demonstration cities plan for rehabilitating blighted city areas.

During the first year, Federal funds would be limited to helping cities draw up plans. It has been estimated that perhaps 60 to 70 cities would receive aid initially.

A similar bill has cleared the House Banking and Currency Committee but has not reached the floor.

Senate action on the demonstration cities bill will coincide with the opening of Senate subcommittee hearings tomorrow on what Senator Abraham A. Ribicoff, Democrat of Connecticut, has called "the crisis of the cities."

Among the first witnesses before Senator Ribicoff's subcommittee on executive reorganization will be several Senate liberals, including Senator Robert F. Kennedy, Democrat of New York.

Senator Kennedy and others have urged the Federal Government in recent months to step up its efforts to erase city blights.

Other witnesses will include members of the Cabinet.

President Signs Bill to Pay 10% Interest on G.I. Savings

JOHNSON CITY, Tex., Aug. 14—President Johnson signed today a bill to pay servicemen overseas up to 10 per cent interest on savings deposited with the Government.

One objective of the legislation is to encourage savings that will help aid the United States balance-of-payments problem. Money spent by servicemen overseas adds to the balance-of-payments deficit, while money saved does not.

City Planners Chided at Parley For Failing to Plan for People

By LAWRENCE E. DAVIES

Special to The New York Times

PORTLAND, Ore., Aug. 16—City planners were accused today of forgetting people and emphasizing things.

This observation, by Prof. Bertram M. Gross of Syracuse University, was repeated in different phraseology by other experts at the annual meeting of the 49-year-old American Institute of Planners.

Stephen Carr of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology took urban designers to task for what he called their failure to collaborate with their "clients," the city dwellers.

He said the method of approach to most city design was like that of the Renaissance period. The present-day "patron," he said, is usually a director of planning or redevelopment, and there is also "the currently favored 'urban designer,' often not a planner and often brought in specially for the job."

But the amount of contact between this designer and the users of the environment is "usually nil," he added.

Professor Carr appealed to planners and designers to be on the side of the people in a "revolution" to increase popular participation in "inventing the future metropolis."

pu 1st add.

'A Small Price to Pay'

If the designer "loses some of his cherished artistic license" in watching the city take form as a joint product of designers and the people who use it, this would be "a small price to pay for better cities," Mr. Carr asserted.

"We are overcommunicated and underinformed," he said. "We are overassimilated without being individualized. We are surrounded by visual images of the city, yet we do not understand them."

Professor Gross, who directs Syracuse University's national planning studies program, complained that the conventional model of city planners was "still the City of Things."

"Yet," he said, "the idea of city planning as physical planning alone has been riddled with bullets on the streets of Watts and Harlem. The body stinks. Let's bury it quickly."

Professor Gross, who spoke at the institute's awards dinner at the Hilton Hotel, viewed "the old hard good techniques of zoning, building regulation, subdivision control and capital budgeting" as insufficient to cope with "pressing urban problems of postindustrial America in the emerging world society."

The City's Potential

"They have but little bearing," he said, "on economic growth, civil rights, education, poverty, ugliness, air and water pollution and traffic congestion. They do not relate sufficiently to the great potentials of our cities as dynamic centers of art, culture, science and education."

Moshe Safdie, Israeli-born Canadian architect, challenged architects and planners to find a way for man in North America to "have his cake and eat it."

He said there was no reason that every family or individual should not live in a spacious, attractive dwelling, that a pedestrian should ever have to cross the path of a car, that a car should ever have to stop for a red light, or that cities should not be so organized as to give complete mobility.

"But we have no image," he said, "we do not know where we are going, we are unable to exercise selection because this clear, simple image of what we want is nonexistent.

"Our problem today is to conceive Utopia, a city which allows men to enjoy all the extremes, from open space and wilderness to the intense enclosure and urbanity of the market and meeting place."

Awards were presented to the Hartford, Conn., area in the population category exceeding 500,000, and to Camden, N. J., in the category of 50,000 to 500,000, for their planning programs.

The institute's annual distinguished service award went to Howard K. Menhinick, Regents Professor of City Planning at the Georgia Institute of Technology.

Irving Hand, executive director of the Pennsylvania State Planning Board, assumed the presidency of the institute, which concludes its sessions tomorrow.

Katzenbach Warns Senate 30 to 40 Cities Face Riots

NYT 8/18/66

He Blames Poverty and Despair, Not Reds or Black Nationalists

By MARJORIE HUNTER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 17 — Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach warned today that "some unpredictable event" could touch off rioting in 30 to 40 of the nation's cities. But he said that poverty and despair, not Communists or black nationalists, were the villains.

"I don't know of a city that is not facing a serious problem today," Mr. Katzenbach said in testimony, before a Senate subcommittee looking into what has been called the crisis of the cities. The Attorney General declined to pinpoint any one city as the most likely scene of new rioting.

"But there are 30 to 40 cities with the same problems, the same frustrations, the same tensions," he said.

He did not disclose the names of the potentially explosive cities at the hearing and declined later to make the list public.

Mr. Katzenbach indignantly stood up to Senator Robert F. Kennedy, Democrat of New York, who has accused the Johnson Administration of having "no program" for dealing with the ills of the cities.

"I disagree with you, Sena-

McCone Report on Watts Tells of Progress but Asks Bigger Effort

By GLADWIN HILL

Special to The New York Times

LOS ANGELES, Aug. 17— The McCone Commission reported today that there had been extensive progress in the Negro district of Watts since the riots of a year ago, but it said that along with other parts of the country, Watts needed a greatly expanded effort to alleviate racial problems.

The commission stressed particularly a need for special programs for the disadvantaged, and cited New York City's More Effective Schools pilot program as an admirable example.

Last weekend was the first anniversary of the five-day rampage in south-central Los Angeles that brought 34 deaths and some $40-million in property damage.

The McCone Commission was established by Gov. Edmund G. Brown to investigate causes and remedies. It is headed by John A. McCone, industrialist and former Director of Central Intelligence.

Today Mr. McCone handed Governor Brown a 49-page "inventory" of progress on recommendations the commission made last December.

"We are encouraged, but far from satisfied, by the progress

M'CONE REPORTS WATTS PROGRESS

made," the report said. "Significant progress has been made on all but a few of the recommendations."

"There has been no major disturbance this summer in the south-central area," the report said. "Nevertheless, tension has continued to be high. There is no room for complacency about this problem.

"Perhaps the most encouraging single development has been the emergence of community efforts to improve conditions and prevent a recurrence of strife."

The commission reported that jobs had been found for 10,000 of 25,000 unemployed in the riot area and that in the field of law enforcement there had been improvements but still were deficiencies.

Education Is Stressed

"Improvement in the educational achievement of the Negro is of fundamental importance to the solution of the whole spectrum of problems of race relations," the report continued. "A commendable start has been made, but a larger commitment of resources is essential."

"I feel it's absolutely to the country's welfare that the level of educational achievement of the underprivileged groups be raised," Mr. Cone said at a news conference on the lawn of Governor Brown's temporary Los Angeles residence.

"It has to be done throughout the United States," he continued. " The level of achievement at every grade is much below the average. Children advance through schools on the basis of age rather than achievement. After high school, we have people coming into society who are virtually illiterate.

"I recommend a costly emergency program—starting with Operation Head Start [a Federal anti-poverty program preschool educational project] and continuing throughout all school levels."

Cites Small Classes

The New York program, he noted, involves such features as 15-pupil classes, special tutoring for problem cases, psychological counseling, and special inducements to attract teachers to this work.

All this, Mr. McCone said, has been "very, very effective" in the opinion of commission representatives who have observed it.

There is general agreement with the idea in California, he continued, but "budgetary considerations have kept the Federal, state and local governments from further implementation of the recommendations."

Advancement of pupils generally on the basis of age is an inescapable school operating policy because of the incessant influx of new entrants, he acknowledged, but it needs to be modified for the educationally underprivileged. He said he did not know how much this might cost.

Warren Christopher, commission vice chairman, said that, for California, the cost of such special schooling had been put at $250 a pupil per year.

Sees 'Dangerous Risk'

"We believe," Mr. McCone said, "that it may be much more expensive in the long run for our society if such programs are not promptly adopted. It is our conviction that we are taking an unnecessary and dangerous risk with our national destiny if we do not make a massive effort to raise the educational levels in disadvantaged areas."

Despite the initial success of the job-finding program—a collaborative effort of the State Employment Service, the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce and 240 industrial concerns—Mr. McCone said, its ultimate effectiveness depends "upon the motivation of the Negro to enter into training programs and upon his ability to compete for employment and advancement."

"This after all is a competitive society," Mr. McCone said. "That's what we have. We must all compete. And the Negro must compete along with others if he wants to attain certain goals."

Governor Brown said that last weekend's three-day Watts Festival "showed magnificent community spirit." But he said "there is no room for complacency whatever."

The Governor asked the McCone Commission to continue its surveillance and periodic reporting on Watts conditions.

The "inventory" noted that an "inspector general" responsible to the civilian police commission had been established as recommended to review complaints. But the report said this inspector had not been given the staff needed for adequate investigations. It also questioned whether the unpaid police commission's once-a-week meetings were adequate for its responsibilities.

Concerning specific recommendations made last December, the McCone report noted that:

¶Preschool programs had not been put on a year-around basis, and had been attended by only 8 per cent of three- and-four-year olds in disadvantaged areas.

¶Opportunities for gifted students to attend advanced classes had been limited to summer courses.

¶Legislation requiring employers of 250 or more persons to report the racial composition of their forces had not been enacted.

On the positive side, the report noted that there had been considerable expansion of bus routes through Watts to improve transportation to jobs and job-training centers.

Eastland Would Ban Protests That Disturb Private Property

WASHINGTON Aug. 17 (AP) —Senator James O. Eastland, Democrat of Mississippi, introduced today amendments to the civil rights bill to provide for injunctions against demonstrations that interfere with the use of private and public property.

Mr. Eastland, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, who is a foe of the House-passed civil rights measure, told the Senate he was seeking to give equal protection to all people.

"If the civil rights marcher is protected while asserting his rights to demonstrate," he said, "correspondingly, private parties whose rights are infringed by the demonstrators are accorded their day in court."

The first of his three amendments would authorize private citizens to go into court for injunctions against demonstrations that interfere with the lawful use of their homes or other private property.

Similarly, injunctions could be obtained against civil rights demonstrations that unreasonably interfere with the free use of public streets and buildings.

The two other amendments he proposed would deal with economic boycotts or other economic coercion by civil rights groups. One would provide for criminal penalties, and the other would authorize injunction suits to be brought either by private individuals or by the Attorney General.

Mr. Eastland said:

"The so-called civil rights movement has embarked upon a campaign of terror, coercion and intimidation to achieve its announced objectives.

"These organizations are now threatening community after community with mass mob action and economic reprisal if their arbitrary demands are not met."

Katzenbach Warns of New City Riots

tor," Mr. Katzenbach said sternly. "I think there is a program."

The two old friends—the Attorney General and the man he once served as deputy and later succeeded—clashed repeatedly during the two-hour hearing.

Mr. Katzenbach reeled off a list of programs, some under way, some still before Congress, seeking to aid cities and urban dwellers.

He cited aid to schools, medicare, the antipoverty drive, demonstration cities, rent supplements, teachers corps, urban renewal, urban mass transit and others.

"We're looking at all this as a whole for the first time in a generation," he said. "You have to crawl before you walk and walk before you run."

"I'm just not satisfied," Mr. Kennedy interrupted.

"You've made that quite clear, Senator," Mr. Katzenbach retorted.

At another point, Senator Kennedy said that the Administration's demonstration cities program—designed to combine physical renewal and social improvements in city slum areas —"is really just a drop in the bucket for what we really need."

"Senator," Mr. Katzenbach said patiently, "this demonstration cities program is just the kind of philosophy you've been asking for."

President Johnson had sought $2.3-billion over six years for the demonstration cities program. The bill, tentatively scheduled for debate this week in the Senate, has been reduced by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee to $900-million over a three-year period.

A strong move is under way to reduce the program still further on the Senate floor. The House has not yet acted.

Mr. Katzenbach said that the demonstration cities program was essential if the nation was to wipe out urban blight and erase the causes of rioting.

But he firmly discounted the assertions of some groups and individuals that riots were fomented by "Communists or black nationalists or terrorists."

Attempts by left-wing groups to exploit racial violence in the Hough area of Cleveland and the Watts area of Los Angeles did not succeed, he said.

"There is no indication that these riots were planned, controlled or run by extreme left-wing elements," he said.

In this, he disagreed with a Cleveland grand jury, which last week concluded that left-wing agitators had fomented the Hough rioting.

The true agitators, Mr. Katzenbach said, are "named disease and despair, joblessness and hopelessness, rat-infested housing and long-impacted cynicism."

He placed the blame on "generations of indifference by all the American people to the rot and rust and mold which we have allowed to eat into the core of our cities."

Much of the tension, he said, stems from antagonism of slum dwellers toward the police. To the poor, he said, policemen are often "the visible symbol of faceless, nameless frustrations."

"It's just essential," the Attorney General said, "that police officers have the respect and confidence of the community, particularly deprived sections of the community, and they just don't have it today."

Asked if he considered it wise for cities to have police review boards, such as that in New York City, Mr. Katzenbach replied:

"If you regard a board as the one solution, it would be disastrous. But if it's recognized as one step in a much more complicated program, I have no objection to it."

Mr. Katzenbach said that the Community Relations Service within his department had assigned mediators to 40 racially troubled cities. He declined to name the cities.

Mediation service is not always welcome, he conceded. For example, he said, he sent two mediators to New York City on July 22, at the request of New York's two Senators, Mr. Kennedy and Jacob K. Javits.

"I mean no criticism of Mayor Lindsay," the Attorney General said, "but he informed us the city could handle the problem."

This occurred at the time of the racial unrest in the East New York area of Brooklyn.

Dallas Reports 88 Cases Of Suspected Encephalitis

DALLAS, Tex., Aug. 17 (AP) —The number of suspected encephalitis cases in Dallas rose to 88 today, a spokesman for Parkland Hospital reported. This was more than double the 41 suspected cases reported through yesterday since the outbreak began in July.

City Health Director Hal J. Dewlett's office reported that aerial spraying of the city had been called for in an attempt to kill the mosquitoes that carry the disease, commonly known as sleeping sickness.

Votes 1.2-Billion Bill, 53-22, for Selected City Areas —G.O.P. Sees 'Waste'

8/20/66

By MARJORIE HUNTER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 19 — President Johnson's $1.2-billion plan for erasing city slums passed the Senate today after a sharp debate. The vote was 53 to 22.

The bill now goes to the House, where strong Republican efforts will be made to strip it down. Nevertheless, it is expected to win final approval there.

The demonstration cities plan, regarded by President Johnson a his major new domestic proposal of the year, grew out of nearly two years of study on how best to attack the social and economic problems of the slums.

The program calls for a coordinated attack by Federal and local agencies on blighted neighborhoods in selected cities of various sizes. The effort would involve the upgrading of dwellings and other buildings as well as the setting up of a wide variety of health, education, recreational and other social services.

White House Maneuvers

The bill encountered rocky going after it was first proposed last February by the President. At times, only backstage maneuvering by the White House saved it from extinction.

The President originally proposed a $2.3-billion, five-year program. As passed by the Senate, it provides $1.2-billion over three years.

The start this year would be modest, with $12-million in planning funds. The authorization for the next fiscal year, starting in July, would be $400-million, plus $12-million more for planning. For the following year, the authorization would be $500-million.

The Senate also authorized $250-million in additional urban renewal funds to be channeled into the demonstration projects.

Also approved was an amendment by Senator Jacob K. Javits, Republican of New York, authorizing $100,000 for studying the problems of noise in homes near airports.

Administration forces easily turned back a move by Senator John G. Tower, Republican of Texas, to cut $900-million from the bill. The amendment failed 33 to 27.

The sharpest attack on the bill came from the Senate's minority leader, Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois.

"This has the prospect of becoming one of the greatest boondoggles this country has ever known," Senator Dirksen said. "It will be shot through with waste and corruption and goodness knows what all before we get through."

But Senator Edmund S. Muskie, Democrat of Maine, pleaded with the Senate to help "achieve the American dream for the child whose playground is a trash-strewn alley, whose classroom is a rat-infested cellar."

Republican critics noted pointedly that two of the bills's supporters — Robert F. Kennedy, Democrat of New York, and Abraham A. Ribicoff, Democrat of Connecticut — had been highly critical this week of Administration efforts to aid the cities.

'Crisis of Cities'

Senator Ribicoff is chairman and Senator Kennedy is a member of a subcommittee that has held hearings all week on what they call "the crisis of the cities."

The witnesses at today's hearings were Sargent Shriver, director of the Ofice of Economic Opportunity, and Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

Senator Kennedy, who sharply criticized Cabinet members testifying earlier this week, clashed for more gently with his brother-in-law, Mr. Shriver.

Noting that the Administration of which Mr. Shriver is a part had given priority to construction of a civilian supersonic plane over certain anti-poverty programs, Mr. Kennedy said:

"I just can't be content with that. It's an outrage."

Mr. Shriver conceded that his agency could use an additional $200-million for its program of preparing deprived children for school.

But he said that his budget was determined by priorities set by the President and by Congress.

Money Called No Cureall for Urban Problems

By MARJORIE HUNIER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 18 — An Administration official said today that a well-meaning Congress had occasionally tried to force more money on his department than it could "intelligently handle."

John W. Gardner, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, told a Senate subcommittee that vast sums of money would be needed to cure the problems of the cities.

But he said:

"I think we should be particularly wary of the old American habit of spending a lot of money to still our anxieties."

He had nothing but praise, however, for the Administration's demonstration cities program, scheduled for final action in the Senate tomorrow.

The program is designed to combine the renewal of physical resources with social services in city slums. The first-year authorization would be limited to $12-million for planning.

A 'New Framework'

Testifying before the Senate Subcommittee on Executive Reorganization, which is conducting a two-year inquiry into city problems, Mr. Gardner described the demonstration cities plan as "an exciting new framework" within which to tackle urban ills.

He said that the first priority on the domestic agenda embraces "the interlocking problems of the Negro, poverty and the cities."

But Gardner Tells Senate Unit Huge Sums Are Needed to Cope With Cities' Ills

Cautioning against reliance on money alone, he said that Federal dollars "may help the city on to new solutions, or they may confirm the old, bad ways of doing things."

He cited one example of current Congressional efforts to force more money on his department than he wants.

A Senate subcommittee has approved a bill calling for a major change in the allocation formula under which Federal funds are given to school districts serving low-income children.

Would Change Level

Under this change, the poverty income level on which allocations are based would be increased from the present $2,000-a-year family income to $3,000 a year. This would double the Federal expenditure of this year-old program.

"We went from zero to $900-million last year," Mr. Gardner said. "We're just not geared up to go from $900-million to $1.8-billion."

The House Education and Labor Committee, heeding Mr. Gardner's wishes, has approved a bill postponing the allocation change for a year. Thus, a fight is likely to shape up on the issue between the Senate and House.

Discussing other programs within his department, Mr. Gardner conceded that up to half of the $6-billion or so in welfare payments each year ended up in rent payments to so-called "slumlords."

"We are trying to do something about this," he assured the investigating subcommittee's chairman, Senator Abraham A. Ribicoff, Democrat of Connecticut.

Defends Report Release

Mr. Gardner also denied charges by Senator Ribicoff that a controversial report on schools had been treated "in a cavalier manner."

The study, ordered by the Civil Rights Act of 1965, was prepared by James Coleman, a sociologist with Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore. It was made public Friday afternoon before the Fourth of July weekend.

"In my experience in Government," Mr. Ribicoff said, "that's the best way for keeping anyone from knowing about it."

The report concluded that students from poor families left school "with greater deficiencies" than when they entered. It urged that poor children be exposed to middle-class pupils in the classrooms.

"I don't know whether Coleman is right or wrong," Senator Ribicoff said. "a lot of these concepts are loaded with political dynamite."

URBAN PROBLEMS

AC 8/20/66

ELLENVILLE, N.Y. (AP) — President Lyndon B. Johnson swung across New York state on Friday in campaign fashion, offering pledges to "take the profit out of poverty" and replace pollution with sparkle in the Great Lakes.

Johnson drew big crowds in the cities and, on a comparative basis, just as big and just as enthusiastic ones in small, rural towns — from Buffalo in the west to Syracuse in the middle of the state and to the Catskill resort area in the south.

It was at Buffalo that Johnson started talking about the sparkle and it was at Syracuse that Johnson declared: "I think it's wrong for some people to line their pockets with the tattered dollars of the poor. So the first thing we should pledge ourselves to do is to take the profit out of poverty."

5-STATE TOUR

The stumping tour through New York was the first stage of a three-day, five-state expedition that ends Sunday in Canada. Saturday, the President moves into Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Vermont and Maine.

He meets Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson at Campobello Island, New Brunswick, to confer and to dedicate a reception center at Roosevelt International Park named for one of Johnson's predecessors, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

All the way Friday, Johnson was plugging his "Great Society" program and getting some pretty strong applause. But he saw some banners here and there that called for getting out of the war in Viet Nam.

TWO SENATORS

He brought along congressmen, of both parties. And for part of the trip New York's two senators turned up — a Democrat and a Republican.

So there were disclaimers of any partisan politics. But, still, the trip was worked out to take Johnson into areas where some freshman Democratic congressmen are in tough races for second terms. And in New York, three of them were picked to introduce him for major speeches, including the windup one at Ellenville on Friday night — just as the sun dipped behind the mountains.

Along the way Johnson summed up: "It's been a very fruitful and productive day. I know I'm going to return to Washington stronger and better."

France Hits Leftists Slur On Johnson

PARIS (UPI)—French authorities will try to prevent the scheduled "trial" of President Lyndon Johnson and other U.S. officials for Viet Nam "war crimes" by an international group of leftist intellectuals, reliable sources said Friday.

The sources said the French government was seriously concerned that such a mock trial would further damage already badly frayed French-American relations.

British philosopher Bertrand Russell announced recently that November in Paris before a panel including him, leftist French philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre, French authoress Sinone de Beauvoir and a number of other persons.

$1.2 Billion Slum Fund Is Voted

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate passed a $1,264,000,000 bill Friday designed to provide improved housing and services in blighted areas of the nation's cities.

The 53-22 vote, after a spirited floor fight, sent the demonstration cities bill to the House where the Banking Committee has approved a similar measure.

President Johnson has repeatedly pointed to the bill as the administration's answer to many of the economic and social problems plaguing cities in all parts of the country.

Its key section would authorize $900 million in supplementary federal grants over the next two years to aid cities in rebuilding slums.

To qualify for some of this money, a city would have to submit and get approval for a broad demonstration cities project. This would include not only "bricks and mortar" spending but also improved services.

These services might include education, recreation, welfare, transportation and health.

Republicans concentrated on trying to knock out the $900 million in grant funds. They proposed to leave only planning money for the demonstration projects.

Johnson Cites 'Critical' Need of Cities; Urges Quick House Action on Aid Bill

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE Jr.
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 6 — President Johnson made a fervent plea today for Congressional passage of the demonstration cities bill, the keystone of his program to rescue the nation's cities from decay and poverty.

The $900-million measure—which has survived apathy, bureaucratic infighting and crippling amendments—is again in serious trouble in the House. A vote on the bill will be taken early next week.

At his news conference, Mr. Johnson declared there was no "more critical" domestic problem than the need to rebuild American cities and to provide urban dwellers with the "opportunites to develop as healthy, educated, productive citizens of our society—citizens who have the ability to get and hold jobs and take pride in the place in which they live." [Question 7, Page 20.]

The demonstration cities bill, he went on, was devised by a bi-partisan panel of distinguished citizens and urban specialists, received thorough consideration in the committee rooms of Congress, and received the "overwhelming" approval of the Senate.

'For The Good af All'

"As I said in the beginning, and as I would repeat again," he concluded, "I think it's one of the most important pieces of legislation for the good of all American mankind that we can act upon this session." He asked the House to take "prompt and favorable action."

An unfavorable vote next week would kill the measure for this session and leave the Administration with the unhappy choice of abandoning it altogether or making another attempt in the next Congress. If the Republicans make even modest election gains, however, the next Congress may be much less sympathetic to domestic spending than the present one with its large Democratic majority.

A defeat would also be a serious blow to Mr. Johnson's prestige — he has pledged to help transform American cities into "the masterpieces of our civilization"—and a disappointment for many urban experts who believe that the measure represents the first systematic attempt to combine the physical processes of urban renewal with the welfare apparatus of the Great Society.

The proposal, as passed by the Senate, calls for a coordinated attack by Federal and local agencies and private enterprise on blighted neighborhoods in carefully selected cities of various sizes.

The attack would involve upgrading dwelling units and providing a wide variety of social services to neighborhood residents. This is designed to meet one of the most persistent criticisms of urban renewal, which is that it does much to tear down slums but little to help slum dwellers.

The local communities would tailor the program to their own needs but would have to meet certain Federal criteria to insure administrative efficiency.

In exchange, the Federal Government would give those cities chosen to participate in the program $12-million in planning funds for the fiscal year 1967, ready access to Federal urban and social programs and $900-million spread over two years to carry out the actual work.

The Administration has already been forced to make concessions to get the bill this far. It had asked originally for $2.3-billion spread over five years, but agreed to the $900-million figure on the ground that this was all it had planned to spend during the first two years of the program anyway.

In addition, officials quietly permitted the Senate to change beyond recognition a provision that would have favored cities willing to "counteract the segregation of housing by race or income" in the demonstration neighborhoods.

However, new problems as well as some of the old ones, have cropped up in the House, causing one strategist to describe next week's vote as the "toughest" of the year.

The first problem is economic. Many Congressemen simply do not want to vote for nearly $1-billion in new authorizations—the actual funds must be approved in a separate appropriations bill, still to come—during a period of intense inflationary pressures.

The second problem is absenteeism. Many Congressmen are home campaigning for the November elections, and unless they return, according to a leader of the Democratic forces in the House, "We don't have the votes."

Even if the House is at full strength—and it will take a Herculean effort by the leadership to achieve this—the vote will be very close and will depend on perhaps 45 members who say they are undecided.

The third — and highly unexpected — problem is the racial issue. Representative Paul A. Fino, Bronx Republican, has charged that the section covering metropolitan planning could be used as a vehicle for busing Negro students into white suburban neighborhoods.

The Metropolitan Planning Section — known as Title II — provides extra "incentive" grants to localities that work together in ten specific areas, including highway planning, sewage treatment facilities and open space development. Joint educational ventures are not on the list.

However, Mr. Fino, in a release this week, cited testimony before a House subcommittee Feb. 28 by Secretary of Housing and Urban Development Robert C. Weaver to support his case that Title II is an instrument for "educational planning."

Mr. Weaver at that time mentioned educational "planning and programming" as one of criteria metropolitan areas must meet in order to qualify for extra grants.

But the Administration retorts that such language is not in the bill itself and that therefore Mr. Fino is raising a false issue.

Demonstration Cities Bill Urged By 22 Top Business Executives

URBAN PROBLEMS

10/11/66

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE Jr.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 10 — A group of 22 chief executives of major American corporations—including David Rockefeller and Henry Ford 2d—joined the drive today to insure Congressional passage of the Administration's demonstration cities bill.

The bill, regarded by President Johnson as the main weapon in his attack on urban blight and poverty, passed the Senate by a wide margin but faces a severe test in the House. Debate is scheduled to begin Thursday, and a vote is forecast for Friday

In a statement issued here early this afternoon, the business group said that urban decay constituted "the most pressing domestic problem of our time." The statement described the bill as an "imaginative" response to this problem and urged "prompt passage" by the House.

Gates and McCone on List

In addition to Mr. Rockefeller, president of the Chase Manhattan Bank, and Mr. Ford, chairman of the board of the Ford Motor Company, the group included several eading Republicans, among them John A. McCone, investment banker and former director of Central Intelligence; Thomas S. Gates Jr., chairman of the board of the Morgan Guaranty Trust Company and former defense secretary in the Eisenhower Administration; and Thomas J. Watson Jr., chairman of the International Business Machines Corporation.

The guiding spirit behind the two-page statement was said to be Edgar F. Kaiser, president of Kaiser Industries and a member of a Presidential study grou that developed the demonstration cities proposal.

White House officials, who welcomed the statement, said that Mr. Johnson himself had not promoted the gesture in any way and that it had been undertaken at Mr. Kaiser's initiative.

"Our cities are being submerged by a rising tide of confluent forces—disease and despair, joblessness and hopelessness, excessive dependence on welfare payments, and the grim threats of crime, disorder and delinquency," the group declared.

Accordingly, the businessmen said, "America needs the demonstration cities act."

They said they were mindful of inflationary pressures and the need to hold down Federal expenditures. But they argued that the measure was "fiscally responsible" and that in any case the problems of the city presented a "crucial" and unavoidable "challenge."

"In our business judgment," the statement concluded, "it deserves to be ranked as high on any list of national priorities as any program we know."

The bill as passed by the Senate would authorize about $900-million over three years to help selected "demonstration" cities develop and carry out comprehensive plans for rebuilding blighted neighborhoods.

The plan would go beyond urban renewal as traditionally practiced in the sense that it would incorporate the welfare and social programs of the great society in any rebuilding program.

The Administration is now thought to have sufficient strength to pass the bill by a slim margin if it can persuade enough representatives to return to the capital in time for the vote. Many are home campaigning for the elections Nov. 8.

Congressional mail on the bill has recently taken a favorable turn. One Administration strategist said that what he termed "right-wing" mail opposing the bill had dropped off and had been replaced by letters supporting it.

A check of Congressional offices confirmed that although the mail was light—as it often is on complex pieces of legislation—it generally favored the measure.

However, Administration sources would make no firm predictions on the outcome, acknowledging that much depended on representatives who had declared themselves undecided.

Other signers of the businessmen's statement were as follows:

Stephen D. Bechtel, chairman, Bechtel Corporation.

Fred J. Borch, president, General Electric.

Howard L. Clark, president, the American Express Company.

Donald Cook, president, American Electric Power Service Corporation.

Justin Dart, president, Rexall Drug Company.

R. Gwin Follis, chairman, Standard Oil of California.

Ben Heineman, chairman, Chicago & North Western Railway and also a member of the Presidential study group.

David Kennedy, chairman, Continental Illinois National Bank and Trust Company.

Robert Lehman, chairman, Lehman Brothers, investment bankers.

Cyril J. Magnin, president, Joseph Magnin Company.

Stanely Marcus, president, Neiman-Marcus.

Alfred E. Perlman, president, Pennsylvania-New York Central Transportation Company.

Herman H. Pevler, president, Norlfolk & Western Railway.

Herbert R. Silverman, chairman, James Talcott, Inc.

Jack I. Strauss, chairman, R. H. Macy, Inc.

$1.2 Billion Slum Bill Passes House, 178-141

URBAN PROBLEMS
AC 10/15/66

By ART PINE
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—A massive $1.2 billion "demonstration cities" bill in which Atlanta has been promised a major role was approved by the House late Friday, 178-141.

The measure, passed by the Senate last August, will give selected cities a priority on federal funds to help them rebuild slums and speed metropolitan planning.

Debated for more than 10 hours, the proposal survived at least six attempts by Rep. Paul A. Fino, R-N.Y., to rid it of connotations permitting bussing of school students which Democrats and other Republicans insisted weren't there.

Congress adopted 21 amendments to the proposal and rejected another 18.

The proposal received strong support on the House floor from Atlanta Rep. Charles L. Weltner, who called it "the only constructive approach" Congress could take to solve urban problems.

Weltner was the only Georgian present to vote for the measure. Reps. Howard (Bo) Callaway, Phil M. Landrum and Maston O'Neal voted against the bill, and Rep. J. Russell Tuten did not vote.

The bill will now go to a Senate-House conference committee.

All told, it would provide $900 million over the next three years for demonstration slum rehabilitation projects.

It would also authorize an additional $250 million for urban renewal, $75 million for metropolitan planning, and $24 million for preliminary studies.

To cities like Atlanta, which is expected to be selected as a demonstration city, the bill would provide:

1. Additional federal aid totalling up to 80 per cent of local and private funds for projects already authorized under existing programs.

Added to the grants Atlanta is already receiving, the measure would in effect boost the federal government's share of anti-poverty funds from the present 90 per cent up to 98 per cent.

Urban renewal grants would be raised from the present 66 per cent of total cost to as much as 92 per cent. Water and sewer grants would rise from 50 per cent to 62 per cent.

Lindsay Accuses Johnson Of 'Shortchanging' Cities

12/8/66

Says $5.3-Billion Budget Cuts That Left Space Program Almost Intact Show Failure to Understand Plight

By STEVEN V. ROBERTS

Mayor Lindsay charged yesterday that President Johnson was "shortchanging the cities of America" by cutting $5.3-billion from the Federal budget this week. Most of the cuts came in programs for housing, transportation, poverty and education.

The Federal Government is spending too much on the war in Vietnam and space programs and not enough on improving the lives of slum-dwellers, the Mayor declared at a City Hall news conference.

"If we made a most modest reassessment" in these areas, the Mayor said, "we could do a substantial amount for the cities."

Mr. Lindsay noted that in making his budget reductions last Tuesday the President had said he was cutting only "low-priority" and "less essential items." This statement, the Mayor added, "is tragic evidence of a fundamental misunderstanding of the plight of the cities."

"Something is wrong with our national priorities," the Mayor continued, "when we reduce our commitment to our cities by well over a billion dollars at the same time we leave our space program virtually intact."

He also reiterated his view

Lindsay Accuses the President Of 'Shortchanging' Cities on Aid

that the escalation of the war in Vietnam was not the best road to peace.

"The time has come," the Mayor concluded, "to stop the rhetoric about a 'rebirth of the American cities,' unless we are willing as a nation to treat that goal as our highest domestic priority."

Mr. Lindsay made most of his comments in response to a reporter's question, but he was obviously eager to talk on the subject. He read from an extensive prepared statement that was handed to reporters immediately after the news conference.

In seeking increased Federal aid for the city the Mayor said he would work closely with the United States Conference of Mayors, which declared on Wednesday that the poor were bearing the major burden of mounting war costs.

Mr. Lindsay said the nation's mayors should "mobilize" a concerted appeal for more funds for urban needs.

He has said before that the cities require more aid, but has seldom been so critical of the Johnson Administration. He noted with a chuckle that there was "general dismay and shock" when he told a Senate subcommittee last August that New York would need $50-billion in Federal aid for the next 10 years.

"It appears that I was close to being accurate," he added.

Mortgage Subsidy Cut

The Mayor said he did not yet know precisely how New York would be affected by the Federal budget cuts. But he noted that $750-million was cut from funds the Congress had authorized the President to make available for the purchase of mortgages by the Federal National Mortgage Association.

This would severly limit the city's ability to build lower middle-income housing—about $25 a room per month—under the new Federal mortgage subsidy program, called 221 (d) (3).

This program is considered important for providing reasonable apartments for middle-income families who might otherwise flee to the suburbs. Moreover, rent supplements can be used to permit poor families to live in developments built under the mortgage program.

Most experts here feel, however, that the problem is a broader one, however. They feel that both the President's and the Mayor's promises to make a major attack on slum conditions are doomed if a great deal more Federal money is not available.

Edward J. Logue said in a recent report to the Mayor that the city needed $1.5-billion in urban renewal aid alone to make a significant start in eradicating slums.

Reason for Refusal

Mr. Logue, the administrator of the Boston Redevelopment Authority, turned down the Mayor's offer to come here largely because he felt New York would not get enough funds to make that start.

New York has had a particularly difficult time attracting Federal funds for development. It received only $50-million for urban renewal this year, or about 6.6 per cent of the national appropriation, and far less per capita than such cities as Boston and New Haven.

Federal officials have in the past been openly critical of the ability of New York's renewal program to handle more aid. A low opinion of New York's operation still prevails among Federal authorities.

This is a major reason why Mayor Lindsay recently reorganized city development programs under a single administrator who could coordinate formerly disparate activities and deal directly with Washington.

The problem in obtaining funds was also one of the strongest reasons for naming Jason R. Nathan to head the new administration. Mr. Nathan spent nine years in the Federal service and reportedly turned down an offer to become an assistant to Robert C. Weaver, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, to come to New York.

Urban Renewal Facing Rights Suits

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE Jr.
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22—The legal arm of the civil rights movement set the stage today for a possible wave of lawsuits charging that local urban renewal agencies overlook the rights of Negro city dwellers.

In a formal complaint to the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., alleged that an urban renewal project in Pulaski, Tenn., would, if completed, violate a half-dozen sections of the Federal urban renewal law.

The project, the complaint said, would deprive Negro residents of their rights under the 14th Amendment to the Constitution.

The complaint asked the department to reject the city's application for Federal urban renewal funds, pending further hearings, and to make a thorough investigation of the Pulaski project.

The basic charge is that the project will displace nearly 50 Negro families from a "desirable" area and move them into areas "clearly less desirable," in violation of two sections of the Federal urban renewal law.

Boundaries of the project, the complaint asserts, were drawn so that only Negroes would be displaced, leaving adjacent whi neighborhoods undisturbed.

Officials of the Legal Defense Fund said the complaint was the last remedy "prior to formal litigation." They added that if the Department of Housing and Urban Development went ahead and supplied Pulaski with Federal funds, they would attempt to block the project in the courts.

'First in a Series'

However, the significance of today's action may extend well beyond Pulaski to the nation as a whole. Officials of the Legal Defense Fund declared that even if this case was settled to their satisfaction, they fully intended to mount a broad, sustained campaign against what they believe have been widespread violations of the urban renewal law by local officials.

"This proceeding is the first in a series," declared Jack Greenberg, counsel and director of the fund, adding:

"We have just furnished our 250 cooperating attorneys with legal materials spelling out means of enforcing the rights of Negro citizens against being uprooted and then compressed further into the ghetto."

A nationwide campaign against alleged urban renewal violations, mounted on the scale of the Legal Defense Fund's assault on school segregation in the nineteen-fifties, would be the first of its kind. It would probably throw the tightly scheduled renewal program into turmoil.

Nearly 2,000 renewal projects have been approved by the housing agency since the program began in 1954, at a cost to the Federal Government of over $6-billion. Of these, some 375 will have been completed by next June 1. The rest are in various stages of construction or planning.

A broad legal assault might delay many projects for months, and would add considerably to the administrative difficulties of the housing agency.

There are many academic critics as well as civil rights advocates who believe that a legal campaign is long overdue. Urban renewal has been charged many times with "exchanging the poor for the prosperous" by clearing slums and then replacing them with either high-income apartments beyond the reach of ghetto residents or with commercial enterprises.

These criticisms were reflected in today's complaint about the Pulaski project. The project approved Sept. 20 by the Mayor and City Council would raze 52 structures on a 17.6-acre site, displacing 46 Negro families, 24 of whom own their own homes.

The cleared area would be used for commercial development; its former occupants would be moved elsewhere in the city.

The complaint criticized both the fundamental assumptions of the project as well as plans for relocating those who would be displaced by it.

It said that the area was one of the "best" Negro neighborhoods in the city and was unsuitable for commercial redevelopment. Federal law requires that a proposed site must contain "environmental deficiencies" before it can be razed, and that proposed re-use of the land be commercially sound.

Discrimination Denied

Special to The New York Times

PULASKI, Tenn., Dec. 22—The Pulaski Housing Authority denied tonight that discrimination against Negroes existed in plans for the West Side urban renewal project.

Harry Cohn, a businessman who is chairman of the authority, said he was unfamiliar with the complaint filed in Washington. But he recalled that complaints, apparently of a similar nature, were made when the Pulaski City Council conducted a public hearing two months ago.

The project is now in the phase known as Part Two, which means that an application for a loan and grant has been filed with the Atlanta regional office of the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

James K. Blackburn, executive director of the Pulaski authority, was in Atlanta today seeking Federal approval for another project. He could not be reached for comment.

Secretary Outlines Plans

His secretary, Mrs. Mack D. Holt, said the West Side project involved about 19 acres, or the equivalent of two small city blocks.

Forty - seven family units would be demolished, of which 25 are occupied by owners and the rest are rented to tenants. Mrs. Holt said only 15 of the houses were "standard" and the rest were "little more than shacks." A few "nice" houses are involved, she said.

Mrs. Holt said residents of the renewal area were being offered homes in a public housing project that was recently completed at a cost of more than $11,000 a unit.

She said all public housing in Pulaski was offered by the Housing Authority on a completely "open" basis—that is, without regard to race.

"We have made every effort to find suitable housing for the people in the West Side urban renewal area," Mrs. Holt said. "We have 40 new units available and they are nice homes. I would be happy to live in one of them."

Pulaski has a population of about 6,600. It is in Southern Tennessee, 28 miles south of Columbia.

To Friends and Members of Urban America, Inc.

I am pleased to send you this booklet—the first of several pieces that we at Urban America will be publishing as part of the follow-through to our national conference on "Our People and Their Cities."

To my mind, this collection of the five major speeches represents not only a splendid statement of our theme but a good sample of the provocative ideas that were submitted for discussion. We send it to you with the hope that it will help carry the discussion to the places where it will count the most—your own home towns.

Forty-seven hours of good and stimulating talk—all that was said in both plenary sessions and discussion groups—have been recorded. We are transcribing the tapes as fast as possible, abstracting from them those suggestions which, in our opinion, offer likely solutions to urban problems and which deserve to be heard and debated by a wider audience. From time to time during the next few months, we will be sharing them with you, through special publications, programs of our Local Group Associates, and regional meetings of our National Action Council.

I invite your interest and your reactions. I do hope you will let me hear from you.

Sincerely yours,

URBAN PROBLEMS

Statement of Purpose: The Urban Coalition

The tangible results of the urban riots in terms of death, injury, and property damage are horrifying in themselves. The intangible damage in terms of the riots' effects on men's minds may yet be even greater.

At this moment, millions of Americans are forming attitudes that could mean disaster to our social structure: the homeowner who vows to shoot the next suspicious character he sees in his neighborhood; the businessman who decides to get out of the slums; the labor leader who determines to keep minorities out; the insurance man who refuses to cover slum properties; the Negro or White who goes out to take whatever he can get his hands on; the legislator who fails to meet his public responsibilities.

These people and others are reversing a trend that, however slowly, was working to the benefit of our cities' disadvantaged minorities. Let them realize that it is the citizen, in the end, who will keep our country united or will divide it. It is government's duty to maintain law and order. But all must understand that law and order is not an excuse for oppression. If law and order is to be accepted by the minorities, the majority must clearly and positively demonstrate its belief that justice, social progress, and equality are rights of every citizen.

We, the undersigned, pledge ourselves to this purpose. We will call upon the leaders of all segments of society, city by city, to publicly commit themselves to programs enabling the disadvantaged minorities to share in all of the benefits of our society.

This conference of leaders of business, labor, religions, education, civil rights, and city government has formed an Urban Coalition to bring about a sense of immediate urgency about the need for positive and progressive action for our cities.

Lawlessness and all its ingredients cannot be tolerated. Looting, burning, and bottle throwing are criminal acts and must be dealt with as such.

But let not a reaction to acts, committed by a small fraction of the population of the country's ghettos, blind us to the absolute necessity of moving dramatically and immediately to correct the desperate condition of our urban centers.

We call upon the nation and the Congress to reorder our national priorities, with a commitment of national resources equal to the dimensions of the problems we face. The crisis requires a full new dimension in both the public and private sectors, working together for jobs, housing, education, and the other needs of our cities.

This Coalition believes the Congress must move without delay on urban programs. The country can wait no longer for model cities, anti-poverty, housing, education, and job training legislation, and a host of other matters that have been too long denied the cities.

We call upon the Federal Government to develop an Emergency Work and Reconstruction Program to provide new training programs and jobs for the unemployed.

The Coalition also believes that the private sector of America must directly and vigorously involve itself in the crisis of the cities by a commitment to investment, job training and hiring, and all other things that are necessary to the full enjoyment of the free enterprise system, and also to its survival.

To carry this forward, the Coalition commits itself to proceed immediately to promote "Earn and Learn Centers" in the cities of the country to provide job training and jobs. The Coalition agrees these centers might well be the joint venture of business, labor, and local government.

The Coalition believes the sickness of the cities, including civic disorder within them, is the responsibility of the whole of America. Therefore, it is the responsibility of every American to join in the creation of a new political, social, economic, and moral climate which will make possible the breaking up of the vicious cycle of the ghetto.

The Coalition's commitment can be for no less and its determination is for even more.

The Coalition further commits itself to convene an Urban Coalition Emergency Convocation in Washington near the end of August.

The Convocation will be attended by 1,000 leaders across the nation of business, labor, religion, education, civil rights, and city government.

URBAN PROBLEMS

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES, GOALS, AND COMMITMENTS
EMERGENCY CONVOCATION: THE URBAN COALITION

We are experiencing our third summer of widespread civil disorder. In 1965, it was Harlem, and the disaster of Watts. In 1966, it was the Hough area of Cleveland, Omaha, Atlanta, Dayton, San Francisco and 24 other cities. This summer, Newark and Detroit were only the most tragic of 80 explosions of violence in the streets.

Confronted by these catastrophic events, we, as representatives of business, labor, religion, civil rights, and local government, have joined in this Convocation to create a sense of national urgency on the need for positive action for all the people of our cities.

We are united in the following convictions:

We believe the tangible effects of the urban riots in terms of death, injury, and property damage, horrifying though they are, are less to be feared than the intangible damage to men's minds.

We believe it is the government's duty to maintain law and order.

We believe that our thoughts and actions should be directed to the deep-rooted and historic problems of the cities.

We believe that we, as a nation, must clearly and positively demonstrate our belief that justice, social progress, and equality of opportunity are rights of every citizen.

We believe the American people and the Congress must reorder national priorities, with a commitment of resources equal to the magnitude of the problems we face. The crisis requires a new dimension of effort in both the public and private sectors, working together to provide jobs, housing, education , and the other needs of our cities.

We believe the Congress must move without delay on urban programs. The country can wait no longer for measures that have too long been denied the people of the cities and the nation as a whole--additional civil rights legislation, adequately funded model cities, anti-poverty, housing, education, and job-training programs, and a host of others.

We believe the private sector of America must directly and vigorously involve itself in the crisis of the cities by a commitment to investment, job-training, and hiring, and all that is necessary to the full enjoyment of the free enterprise system--and also to its survival.

We believe the sickness of the cities, including civic disorder within them, is the responsibility of the whole of America. Therefore, it is the responsibility of every American to join in the creation of a new political, social, economic, and moral climate that will make possible the breaking of the vicious cycle of the ghetto. Efforts must be made to insure the broadest possible opportunity for all citizens and groups, including those in the ghetto, to participate fully in shaping and directing the society of which they are a part.

This Convocation calls upon the nation to end once and for all the shame of poverty amid general affluence. Government and business must accept responsibility to provide all Americans with opportunity to earn an adequate income. Private industry must greatly accelerate its efforts to recruit, train, and hire the hard-core unemployed. When the private sector is unable to provide employment to those who are both able and willing to work, then in a free society the government must of necessity assume the responsibility and act as the employer of last resort or must assure adequate income levels for those who are unable to work.

Emergency Work Program

This Convocation calls upon the Federal Government to develop an emergency work program to provide jobs and new training opportunities for the unemployed and underemployed consistent with the following principles:

--The Federal Government must enlist the cooperation of government at all levels and of private industry to assure that meaningful, productive work is available to everyone willing and able to work.

--To create socially useful jobs, the emergency work program should concentrate on the huge backlog of employment needs in parks, streets, slums, countryside, schools, colleges, libraries, and hospitals. To this end an emergency work program should be initiated and should have as its first goal putting at least one million of the presently unemployed into productive work at the earliest possible moment.

--The program must provide meaningful jobs--not dead-end, make work projects--so that the employment experience gained adds to the capabilities and broadens the opportunities of the employees to become productive members of the permanent work force of our nation.

--Basic education, training, and counseling must be an integral part of the program to assure extended opportunities for upward job mobility and to improve employee productivity. Funds for training, education, and counseling should be made available to private industry as well as to public and private nonprofit agencies.

--Funds for employment should be made available to local and state governments, nonprofit institutions, and Federal agencies able to demonstrate their ability to use labor productively without reducing existing levels of employment or undercutting existing labor standards or wages which prevail for comparable work or services in the area but are not less than the Federal minimum wage.

--Such a program should seek to qualify new employees to become part of the regular work force and that normal performance standards are met.

--The operation of the program should be keyed to specific, localized unemployment problems and focused initially on those areas where the need is most apparent.

Private Employment Assistance and Investment

All representatives of the private sector in this Urban Coalition decisively commit themselves to assist the deprived among us to achieve full participation in the economy as self-supporting citizens. We pledge full-scale private endeavor through creative job-training and employment, managerial assistance, and basic investment in all phases of urban development.

The alternatives to a massive and concerted drive by the private sector are clear. They include the burden of wasted human and physical potential, the deterioration of the healthy environment basic to the successful operation of any business, and the dangers of permanent alienation from our society of millions of citizens.

We propose to initiate an all-out attack on the unemployment problem through the following steps:

--In cooperation with government, to move systematically and directly into the ghettos and barrios to seek out the unemployed and underemployed and enlist them in basic and positive private training and employment programs. We will re-evaluate our current testing procedures and employment standards so as to modify or eliminate those practices and requirements that unnecessarily bar many persons from gainful employment by business or access to union membership.

--To create a closer relationship between private employers and public training and emergency employment programs to widen career opportunities for our disadvantaged citizens. To this end, we will proceed immediately to promote "Earn and Learn Centers" in depressed urban areas that might well be the joint venture of business, labor and local government.

--To develop new training and related programs to facilitate the early entry of under-qualified persons into industrial and commercial employment.

--To develop large-scale programs to motivate the young to continue their education. Working closely with educators, we will redouble our efforts to provide part-time employment, training, and other incentives for young men and women. We also pledge our active support to making quality education readily accessible to deprived as well as advantaged young people.

--To expand on-the-job training programs to enhance the career advancement prospects of all employees, with particular emphasis on those who now must work at the lowest level of job classifications because of educational and skill deficiencies.

We pledge to mobilize the managerial resources and experience of the private sector in every way possible. We will expand part-time and full-time assistance to small business development. We will strive to help residents of these areas both to raise their level of managerial know-how and to obtain private and public investment funds for development. We will work more closely with public agencies to assist in the management of public projects. We will encourage more leaders in the private sector to get directly and personally involved in urban problems so that they may gain a deeper understanding of these problems and be of greater assistance.

We pledge our best efforts to develop means by which major private investment may be attracted to the renovation of deteriorating neighborhoods in our cities. We will explore and encourage governmental incentives to expedite private investment. We will develop new methods of combining investment and managerial assistance so that the residents may achieve a leadership position in the development of their areas.

Housing, Reconstruction, and Education

This Convocation calls upon the nation to take bold and immediate action to fulfill the national need to provide "a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family" with guarantees of equal access to all housing, new and existing. The Urban Coalition shall, as its next order of business, address itself to the development of a broad program of urban reconstruction and advocacy of appropriate public and private action to move toward these objectives, including the goal of rehabilitation and construction of at least a million housing units for lower-income families annually.

This Convocation calls upon the nation to create educational programs that will equip all young Americans for full and productive participation in our society to the full potential of their abilities. This will require concentrated compensatory programs to equalize opportunities for achievement. Early childhood education must be made universal. Work and study programs must be greatly expanded to enlist those young people who now drop out of school. Financial barriers that now deny to youngsters from low-income families the opportunity for higher education must be eliminated. Current programs must be increased sufficiently to wipe out adult illiteracy within five years.

This Convocation calls upon local government, business, labor, religions, and civil rights groups to create counterpart local coalitions where they do not exist to support and supplement this declaration of principles.

This Convocation calls upon all Americans to apply the same determination to these programs that they have to past emergencies. We are confident that, given this commitment, our society has the ingenuity to allocate its resources and devise the techniques necessary to rebuild cities and still meet our other national obligations without impairing our financial integrity. Out of past emergencies, we have drawn strength and progress. Out of the present urban crisis we can build cities that are places, not of disorder and despair, but of hope and opportunity. The task we set for outselves will not be easy, but the needs are massive and urgent, and the hour is late. We pledge ourselves to this goal for as long as it takes to accomplish it. We ask the help of the Congress and the Nation.

Birmingham Finds Clue in Bombing

VIOLENCE AND INTIMIDATION (V+d)

AC 2/24/66

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. (UPI) — Police officials announced Wednesday they soon may have enough evidence to arrest the Birmingham racial bombers who killed four Negro girls in 1963 and struck terror in the hearts of residents for years.

Jefferson County Sheriff Mel Bailey, an ex-FBI agent, said the discovery of six and one-half cases of dynamite in a rural area Sunday afternoon had established the "first direct link" to the bombers.

Suspects in the case, he said were "members of an organization," but declined to name the group.

CALLED BEST FIND

"This evidence is the best and most exciting find yet in tracing the identity of the bombers," Bailey declared.

He referred not only to the dynamite, but to the blasting caps, timing devices and other paraphernalia discovered along with the cache of explosives.

"This and other physical evidence at the scene has established that this is likely the place where plotters rigged, or at least partially rigged, the fiendish green time bombs placed outside Mayor Albert Boutwell's home, the home of a Birmingham councilman and homes in Negro communities," Bailey said.

He said he believed the "same person or persons who planted the green box time bombs also were involved in the church bombing." This was a reference to the dynamite blast that shattered one side of the 16th Street Baptist Church Sept. 15, 1963 killing four young Negro girls who were attending Sunday school.

OTHER EXPLOSIONS

Long before this bombing, explosions had been touched off in other sections of the Negro district. So many such incidents occurred in one area that Negroes nicknamed it "dynamite hill."

Coming at a time when racial tensions were at an all-time high in the southern steel center, the blasts frequently touched off riots in the Negro district. At least three Negroes were shot to death in such riots, two of them following the church bombings.

Bailey said he was "optimistic" that someone with additional evidence of the bombings, "or possibly even one of the bombers," might come forward now that police had uncovered the dynamite.

The sheriff said he expected to "be in contact soon" with someone who had talked to "the bomber of bombers," but that he did not want to discuss this aspect of the case further in fear of scaring off his contact.

"I cannot over-emphasize how excited we are about this discovery," Bailey said. "In the past there has been an almost void of physical evidence in bombing investigations. Now we have something we can work with."

Two Blasts Wreck Integrated School In Alabama Town

ELBA, Ala., Feb. 25 (AP) — Two heavy explosions wrecked one wing of newly integrated Elba High School Thursday night, less than an hour after a banquet attended by some 200 people had ended. Police Chief I. F. Dunaway said that the area around the explosions "smelled just like dynamite."

Mr. Dunaway said there were no injuries as a result of the blast, which occurred about 10:30 P.M.

The chief said the blast blew one wall and a classroom "right out of existence and left another room and the hall in a shambles."

He said that officials "just can't imagine why anyone would dynamite that school."

One Negro senior and one Negro junior had enrolled in the predominantly white school in September, he said, but "there was absolutely no trouble between the two races and, frankly, we never expected any."

The officer said that there had been no threats against the school.

He said, however, that his officers had found two dynamite bundles in a house on the outskirts of town last week, one of 24 sticks, the other of 12, both capped and fused.

He said an investigation of the explosives had produced no results and there were no concrete indications that the two incidents were related.

Negro Army Captain Shot in Bogalusa

BOGALUSA, La., March 11 (UPI) — A Negro Army captain preparing to ship out to Vietnam was shot by a sniper while his back was turned early today.

The captain, Donald Sims, tearfully said he believed the shooting was linked to the racial quarrels that have erupted in violence several times in Bogalusa.

Captain Sims, 29 years old, was hit by one of at least three shots that ripped through a plate glass window as he spoke on a public telephone in a brightly lighted all-night service station.

The bullet penetrated his shoulder and lodged in his neck, but he walked to a hospital after two Negroes in a car refused to take him. He was in good condition.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation joined local and state police in the investigation. In Washington, Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara called on the Justice Department to step in.

Captain Sims, a six-year Army veteran just back from Germany and on his way to guerrilla training for Vietnam, was in civilian clothes.

"There was no advance warning, I saw nothing, heard nothing," the muscular six-footer said from his hospital bed.

"I have no idea who did it," he said. His eyes filled with tears as he told of thinking of the irony of being shot at home just as he was about to be sent to Vietnam.

Three spent 22-caliber cartridges were found at the scene on Columbia Road, the main street where civil rights demonstrations were staged last spring and summer.

Captain Sims was transferred from Bogalusa to the United States Public Health Service Hospital in New Orleans.

In a bedside interview, the captain said that he had gasped on the phone to his brother Richard, in Los Angeles, that he had been shot.

The brother telephoned their parents at Sun, La., 10 miles from Bogalusa in southeast Louisiana near the Mississippi border, and told them what happened. The police arrived moments later.

The lone attendant at the service station, Ross Thomas, said he had been on the other side of the building and had not even heard the shots.

Mr. Thomas said he tried to get a Negro couple who drove into the station shortly after the shooting to take Captain Sims to the hospital, but they refused, saying they did not want to get involved.

Phone Call Cited in Shooting

BOGALUSA, La. (AP) — A white man charged in the shooting of a Negro Army captain was free in $10,000 bond Monday awaiting arraignment.

Police quoted Thomas Bennett, 43, a Bogalusa sheet metal worker, as saying he shot Capt. Donald Ray Sims, 29, because Sims talked too long on a public telephone.

Bennett was booked Saturday on charges of attempted murder.

Bennett's bond was posted by Saxon Farmer, who has been identified as a Ku Klux Klan leader, by Earnest Ray McElveen, charged with the murder of a Negro deputy sheriff near here last June, and by six others. His arraignment was set for March 24.

Sims was wounded in the right shoulder early Friday while he talked on a telephone in a service station where Bennett once was employed. He was in satisfactory condition at a New Orleans hospital. Sims was to be assigned to Viet Nam following home leave.

Police said Bennett told them he went to the service station to talk with the attendant and to use the telephone. He found Sims talking on the phone. Bennett left, returned about an hour later to find Sims still on the telephone, left again, then returned with his rifle and fired four times.

Three spent cartridge casings were found outside the service station. They matched a rifle taken from Bennett's home, according to the state police crime laboratory in Baton Rouge.

Bond Loses Appeal for A Speedup

AC 3/29/66

By REMER TYSON
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday upheld the federal government's right under an 1870 law to prosecute six men on charges of conspiring to oppress Negroes in northeast Georgia.

The court held in a companion case that the government can try 17 Mississippi men under the same conspiracy law on charges growing out of the June 1964 slaying of three civil rights workers near Philadelphia, Miss.

In separate actions the court turned down a request to speed up proceedings on an appeal by Julian Bond, who was denied a seat in the Georgia House, and rejected an appeal challenging the Metropolitan Atlanta Rapid Transit Authority Act of 1965.

MISSISSIPPI CASE

In the Mississippi case, the Supreme Court ruled unanimously that the government had a right to prosecute because the 17 defendants were clearly acting "under color of law."

The Mississippi defendants include Sheriff Lawrence A. Rainey of Neshoba County, deputy Cecil Price and Richard A. Willis, a Philadelphia policeman.

Four opinions were written in the Georgia case, however. Justice Potter Stewart wrote the majority opinion.

PENN DEATH BASIS

Although the slaying of Lemuel Penn, a Washington, D.C., educator, was not mentioned in the federal indictment against the six Georgians, three of them were charged under state law with murder in connection with his death.

Cecil William Myers, Joseph Howard Sims and James S.

Lackey, all identified at Athens as Ku Klux Klansmen, were charged with murder in the Penn slaying.

In U.S. District Court at Macon, Ga., Judge W. A. Bootle, in his decision overturning the federal conspiracy indictments, noted that Myers and Sims had been acquitted in state court of the murder charges.

GUNNED IN CAR

Lackey has not been tried in state court.

Penn, a lieutenant colonel in the Army reserves, was slain by a shotgun blast as he drove along a northeast Georgia highway. He was returning to Washington from summer military duty in Fort Benning, Ga.

The other three men named in the federal indictment were Herbert Guest, Denver Willis Phillips and George Hampton Turner.

Judge Bootle had ruled the indictment invalid on grounds that the alleged actions were not federal crimes. The majority opinion found Judge Bootle in error on two parts of the indictment and did not rule on a third part.

One portion of the indictment upheld by the Supreme Court accused the six men of conspiring "to injure, oppress, threaten and intimidate Negro citizens" by impeding interstate travel on highways and other facilities.

"The constitutional right to travel from one state to another, and necessarily to use the highways and other instrumentalities of interstate commerce in doing so, occupy the position fundamental to the concept of our Federal Union," wrote Justice Stewart. "It is a right that has been firmly established and repeatedly recognized."

The majority opinion continued, "A specific intent to interfere with the federal right must be proved, and at a trial the defendants are entitled to a jury instruction phrased in those terms . . ."

ARRESTS CITED

Justice Stewart's opinion said the extent of official state action was not made clear in the Georgia indictment, but that the allegation was sufficient for prosecution.

Part of the indictment charged the six defendants with "causing the arrest of Negroes by means of false reports that such Negroes had committed criminal acts."

The majority opinion held that "the allegation is broad enough to cover a charge of active connivance by agents of the state in making of the 'false reports' or other conduct amounting to official discrimination clearly sufficient to constitute denial of rights protected by the equal protection clause."

DISMISSAL OUT

Although it may be proved in court proceedings that no state action was involved, the majority opinion said, "the allegation is enough to prevent dismissal of this branch of the indictment."

The court said "settled principles of review" prevented it from ruling in this case on part of the indictment charging the six Georgians with conspiring to deprive Negroes of their rights to public accommodations such as theaters and restaurants.

OVERRULED
Judge W. A. Bootle

Justice John M. Harlan wrote an opinion concurring with the majority, except in the interpretation of the right to interstate travel without private interference.

HARLAN ON TRAVEL

"While past cases do indeed establish that there is a constitutional right to travel between states free from unreasonable governmental interference," wrote Justice Harlan, "today's decision is the first to hold that such movement is also protected against private interference, and, depending on the constitutional source of the right, I think it is either unwise or impermissable so to read the Constitution."

Harlan said he would sustain that part of the indictment only on the premise that it "sufficiently alleges state interference with interstate travel, and on no other ground."

13 Klansmen In Mississippi Held in Slaying

By JAMES BONNEY

HATTIESBURG, Miss. (AP)—Federal agents climaxed an intense investigation into the fiery death of a Negro leader here with the arrest Monday of 13 men they identified as Mississippi Ku Klux Klansmen.

A 14th, who the FBI identified as Imperial Wizard Sam Holloway Bowers Jr., was being hunted. The FBI described him as armed and dangerous.

The 14 were charged with civil rights law violations stemming from the Jan. 10 slaying of Vernon F. Dahmer, 58. Dahmer awoke that day and found his home and nearby store in flames. He exchanged shots with his attackers but died from burns several hours later at a Hattiesburg hospital.

Dahmer was a past president of the Forrest County Branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. He had been active in voter registration work.

The FBI charged the 14 men with violating a 19th century law that makes it a crime to conspire to intimidate persons pursuing their constitutional righs. This law, passed during the post Civil War reconstruction era, was aimed at the Klan of that day.

The 14 men also were charged in the FBI complaint with violation of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which makes it a crime to harm or intimidate persons attempting to vote or urging others to vote.

Agents fanned over adjoining Jones County at dawn Monday, and within two hours had picked up 12 men, all of them described as members of the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan of Mississippi. Among them were Cecil V. Sessum, 30, of Ellisville, listed by the FBI as Exalted Cyclops of the Jones County klavern, and Howard T. Giles, 37, described as a former exalted cyclops of the Ellisville klavern.

A 13th man, Charles Lamar Lowe, 23, was arrested at Houston, Tex., where he recently got a job as a clerk and stockman. Lowe denied belonging to the Klan.

Those arrested in Jones County were arraigned in Hattiesburg before U.S. Commissioner Jack Pittman. Pittman set a preliminary hearing for April 12. Their bonds varied from $10,000-$15,000.

They were: Lawrence Byrd, 44, Laurel; Henry E. de Boxtel, 29, Laurel; Howard T. Giles, 37, Ellisville; Clifton E. Lowe, 50, father of Charles Lowe; James F. Lyons, 33, Laurel; Melvin E. Martin, 33, Laurel; Emanuel B. Boss, 52, Laurel; Deavours Nix, 42, Laurel.

Charles R. Noble, 23, Laurel; Billy Roy Pitts, 22, Laurel; Cecil V. Sessum, 30, Ellisville; William R. Smith, Laurel.

Court Rules Athens Kluxers Can Face Penn Rights Trial

Vtd As 3/29/66

By MARGARET SHANNON
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON, March 29—The U.S. Supreme Court has reversed the dismissal of a conspiracy case against six Athens, Ga., Ku Klux Klansmen and sent it back to the federal district court for middle Georgia for further proceedings.

The decision in effect held that the six men could be tried on charges of conspiring to deprive Negroes of their civil rights. The case was the aftermath of the slaying of Washington Negro educator Lemuel Penn near Athens in 1964.

At the same time Monday, the Supreme Court also reversed a lower court decision in a Mississippi case growing out of the slaying of three civil rights workers near Philadelphia, Mississippi.

The court held that 15 men allegedly involved in the conspiracy were subject to trial along with three law enforcement officers because they were acting with the officers "under cover" of law.

Both the Georgia and Mississippi cases involved laws enacted during Reconstruction. The decisions Monday give the federal government a strong weapon in seeking to end intimidation and violence againce Negroes in the South.

THE SIX MEN involved in the Georgia case are Herbert Guest, James Spergeon Lackey, Cecil William Myers, Denver Willis Phillips, Joseph Howard Sims and George Hampton Turner.

They were charged with conspiring to violate the rights of Negroes by shooting, beating, killing and other means, including the arrests of Negroes through false reports of criminal acts.

Myers and Sims have been tried and acquitted in state court in the Penn murder. Lackey was indicted in the murder, but has not been tried. The federal indictment does not specifically mention the Penn case.

The majority opinion, delivered by Justice Potter Stewart, said that it was unnecessary for the court to determine whether the 14th amendment and the reconstruction laws apply when there is no state action—that is, action by law enforcement officers or official agencies — involved.

The opinion said that the indictment contains "an express allegation of state involvement sufficient at least to require the denial of a motion to dismiss."

That allegation, the majority opinion said, is implied in the indictment statement about false arrests of Negroes. If there was connivance by agents of the state, the equal protection clause of the 14th amendment would clearly be involved, the opinion said.

Three of the justices dissented to the extent that they thought the majority opinion did not go far enough.

Justice William Brennan, joined by Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justice William O. Douglas, said that a conspiracy by non-offical persons could be prosecuted as well as the conspiracies involving any state action.

He said that "severe limitations" are placed on the prosecution in the case of the Athens Klansmen because of the majority opinion.

On a key issue in the Athens case—the right of an interstate traveler to use the highways without interference — the Supreme Court said that "freedom to travel throughout the United States had long been recognized as a basic right under the Constitution."

The Penn slaying occurred along a highway as Penn, a reserve officer, was returning to Washington from Ft. Benning, where he had been for a training period.

THE SUPREME COURT said it has in previous decisions settled that "the federal commerce power authorizes Congress to legislate for the protection of individuals from violations of civil rights that impinge on their free movement in interstate commerce."

The court said that a specific intent to interfere with the federal right must be proved and "at a trial the defendants are entitled to a jury instruction phrased in those terms."

A conspiracy to rob an interstate traveler would not violate the Reconstruction law, the court said. It added:

"But if the predominate purpose of the conspiracy is to impede or prevent the exercise of the right of interstate travel, or to oppress a person because of his exercise of that right, then, whether or not motivated by racial discrimination, the conspiracy becomes a proper object of the federal law under which the indictment in this case was brought."

Much of the court's decision in the Georgia case was based on what it decided in the Mississippi case Monday.

The slaying of civil rights workers Michael Schwerner, Andrew Goodman and James Chaney occurred in 1964. Their bodies were found in an earthen dam in Neshoba County, Miss.,

WASHINGTON, March 28 — The Supreme Court ruled today that the Federal Government may try, on charges other than that of murder, persons it believed were involved in 1964 in the slaying of three civil rights workers in Mississippi and a Negro educator in Georgia.

By broadening previous court interpretations of a civil rights law of the reconstruction era, the Court empowered the Justice Department to act in certain situations in which Southern state courts have not punished acts of racial violence. The Court's vote was 9 to 0.

For the first time, also, the court declared that the Federal Government may punish individuals for interfering with the constitutional rights of citizens to travel from one state to another.

Says Congress Can Act

Moreover, six Justices stated in concurring opinions that Congress has the constitutional power to pass broader laws against racial violence.

The Johnson administration has been holding up its recommendations to Congress for legislation to curb the Ku Klux Klan in hopes of obtaining such an indication from the Court. Sources within the Justice Department said today's decisions were already being studied with an eye toward broadening present laws.

At issue today were the following murders during the summer of 1964, a time of tumultous civil rights activity in the Deep South:

¶First, the slaying on June 21 of Michael Schwerner and Andrew Goodman, both white men from New York, and James E. Chaney, a Mississippi Negro, near Philadelphia, Miss.

¶Second, the shotgun killing on July 11 of Lemuel A. Penn, of Washington, on a highway near Colbert, Ga.

2 Acquitted in Georgia

In the Mississippi case no state charges have been brought. In the Georgia case, two alleged klansmen were tried and acquitted in a Georgia court. A third was indicted but not tried.

In the Mississippi case, the Justice Department indicted 18 men, including three police officers. They were charged under two sections of a civil rights law of 1870.

The first section accused them of acting "under color of state law" to deprive the three slain men of their rights. This statute, Section 242 of Title 18, United States Code, carries a maximum penalty of one year in prison and a $1,000 fine.

The Secnd Statute, Section 24 of Title 18, provides for 10 years imprisonment and a $5,000 fine for conspiring to injure a citizen in the free exercise of any Federal right or privilege.

In ruling on 17 of the 18 cases, Federal District Judge Harold Cox of Jackson,

Supreme Court Holds, 9 to 0, U.S. Can Prosecute Rights Murder Suspects as Violators of Freedoms

Miss., threw out the "color of law" charges against 14 defendants who were private citizens but left standing the charges against the three officers.

He dismissed all the charges under the 'conspiracy' section, 241. In so doing he ruled that murder is a state crime only, and that this section protects only "federally created" rights such as the right to use a Federal post office or to vote in Federal election.

The 18th man had his case transferred to another Federal court before Judge Cox ruled.

Writing for the unanimous Court today, Justice Abe Fortas reversed Judge Cox on both issues.

Justice Fortas said that when private persons acted with state officials to deny citizens their rights, all were equally guilty of violating Section 242.

On the conspiracy charge he acknowledged that in 1951 Justice Felix Frankfurter wrote an opinion, affirming a decision by a 4-to-4, vote, that accepted Judge Cox's theory that Section 241 protects only federally created rights.

Early View Re-examined

But based on a reexamination of the question, Justice Fortas said, the rights protected by the section include the 14th Amendment's right not to be denied life and liberty without due process of law.

In the Georgia case, the Federal Government indicted six men for conspiring to deprive Negroes of their rights to use both private and state-owned public facilities and to travel freely to and from the State of Georgia. The indictment covered a period of several months and did not mention Dr. Penn by name.

Federal District Judge W. A. Bootle dismissed the indictments on ground similar to that cited by Judge Cox, also relying upon Justice Frankfurter's opinion in 1951.

The Justice Department's position was complicated by the fact that none of the six men were public officials, and that the federal courts have consistently ruled that the 14th Amendment applies to state action only, and not to the discriminatory acts of private persons.

Speaking for all the justices except Justice John M. Harlan, Justice Potter Stewart partly avoided this problem by stating that aside from 14th Amendment rights, Section 241 protects the right of citizens to travel from state to state.

Associated Press

Justice Abe Fortas wrote the opinion of the Court.

Regarded as Fundamental

This right is so fundamental, he said, it was not written into the Constitution, although it had been stated in the Articles of the Confederation.

He cited a number of cases in which the Supreme Court had safeguarded this right against state interference, and concluded that it protects "persons as well as livestock and frozen fish."

In a footnote, Justice Stewart said Federal Courts could punish violations of this right even by private individuals, since it does not depend upon the 14th Amendment. Justice Harlan dissented from this part of the opinion on the ground that all the cases relied upon by Justice Stewart concerned interference by states.

In the first section of his opinion, which had the backing of the entire Court, Justice Stewart did not decide whether the Federal courts could punish private persons for violence against Negroes who were exercising the right of free access to public accommodations guaranteed by the Civil Rights Act of 1964. This issue was improperly appealed to the Supreme Court, Justice Stewart said, in refusing to rule on it.

He said that the defendants could be prosecuted for trying to deny Negroes access to state-owned public accommodations, if it developed that state officials had conspired with the defendants to charge the Negroes falsely with criminal acts. This would supply the necessary "state action" to support a case under the 14th Amendment, he said.

3 Offer Qualification

On this point, Justice Tom C. Clark, joined by Justices Hugo L. Black and Fortas, said in a concurring opinion that Justice Stewart was being too cautious.

"There can be no doubt," Justice Clark said, that Congress has the power "to enact laws punishing all conspiracies—with or without state action—that interfere with 14th Amendment rights."

A second concurring opinion by Justice William J. Brennan Jr., in which Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justice William O. Douglas joined, agreed with this conclusion. This concurrence noted that six Justices—a clear majority of the high court—had gone on record asserting the constitutionality of a statute providing punishment for private persons who interfere with 14th Amendment rights to enjoy state-owned public facilities.

In a pointed suggestion that Congress broaden the existing laws, Justice Brennan said that Section 241 does not specifically cover action by private individuals and that "the remedy is for Congress to write a law without this defect."

Now that the Supreme Court has increased the utility of Section 241 and by broadening its application, the Justice Department is expected to ask Congress to increase its penalties.

Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach is known to favor a flexible set of penalties that could be matched with the severity of the violence used. This would allow the Federal courts to mete out the same types of sentences that defendants would have received if they had been convicted in state courts.

Solicitor General Thurgood Marshall argued the Government's case. H. C. Mike Watkins of Meridian, Miss., argued for the defendants in the Mississippi case. James E. Hudson of Athens, Ga., and Charles J. Bloch of Macon, Ga., argued for the defendants in the Georgia case.

End of 'Apathy' Sought

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

PHILADELPHIA, Miss., March 28—A Methodist minister said today that the Supreme Court's decision on civil rights slayings could force the community to re-examine its position of "apathy" on the Government's charges.

Up until now, said the Rev. Clay Lee, most of the persons in Neshoba County have been "inclined to think the Federal Government has concocted the case" against Sheriff Lawrence Rainey, Deputy Cecil Price and 16 others.

"The decision will mean a trial and a trial—I should hope—will mean facts instead of rumors," said Mr. Lee, one of the few whites in Philadelphia who consistently had been willing to discuss the case publicly.

"The slaying," he continued, "has not been a conversation piece for a long time—it has been swept under the rug. But if the Government has a strong case it might arouse the public to do something. If it is a weak case it may have the reverse effect."

Another Philadelphian said that the Supreme Court's decision had been given a "mixed reaction."

"Some of us are absolutely elated to finally get the case in court," the person said. "But the majority has been apathetic—they said, 'oh, I thought it was settled.' "

Among the group of persons in Philadelphia who thought the slayings had been dismissed too lightly in the county, there was a general feeling that a strong case could damage any chances Deputy Price might have of succeeding Sheriff Rainey in next year's elections.

It is widely believed here that Deputy Price will run for the post. A state law bars Sheriff Rainey and other Mississippi sheriffs from succeeding themselves in office.

Act that prohibits intimidating prospective voters. The section carries a penalty of five years in prison.

They are also charged with violating Section 241 of the United States Code prohbiting conspiracy to violate a person's civil rights. The section carries a 10-year prison term. The Supreme Court approved today the prosecution of two other Federal cases involving Section 241.

Inquiry Continuing

Mississippi authorities, who worked with the F.B.I. in the Dahmer killing, are continuing their investigation and are expected to file state charges, possibly homicide.

Attorney General Nicholas de B. Katzenbach announced the arrests in Washington.

"As in past civil rights cases," he said, "the arrests today culminate thousands of hours of exceptional and painstaking investigative effort by the F.B.I."

Roy K. Moore, special agent in charge of the F.B.I. in Mississippi, has lived in a motel room at Hattiesburg for all but three of the 76 days since the killing. He has directed some 30 agents. Eight to 10 state highway patrol detectives and members of the Forrest County Sheriff's Office also worked on the case.

The arrests began at dawn today. The agents picked up the first of the suspects at 6 A.M. Central standard time. All except Bowers had been arrested by 7:10 A.M. One man, Charles Lamar Lowe, 23, formerly of Laurel, was arrested at Houston, Tex.

When Bowers had not been arrested by noon, he was classified as a fugitive.

Warned of Red Invasion

Bowers, 41, blond and single, owns the Sambo Amusement Company at Laurel. Some of his coin-operated amusement machines are in Negro businesses.

He has warned his members repeatedly that Communists and Negroes are trying to take over the United States. He once prepared his men for a Communist invasion from the Gulf of Mexico, some 100 miles to the south.

Twelve of the men were arrested in neighboring Jones County, the main stronghold of the White Knights. They were taken before United States Commissioner Jack H. Pittman in the Forrest County Courthouse at Hattiesburg. He set bonds of $10,000 for 10 of the men and $15,000 for two others.

Among those arrested were Cecil Victor Sessum, 30, Exalted Cyclops of Klavern No. 4 of the White Knights in Jones County; Deavours Nix, 42, state Klan hero investigator for the organization: Howard Travis Giles, 37, former Exalted Cyclops of the Ellisville (Jones County) Keavern, and Lawrence Byrd, 44, "county senator" of the White Knights for Jones County.

Hearing Set April 12

The two other lawyers representing the 13 men are State Representative Charles Blackwell of Jones County and Travis Buckley, county attorney of nearby Jasper County. Mr. Buckley is encouraging speculation that he will run for Congress on the Republican ticket this year.

The men will be given a preliminary hearing here April 12.

Others arrested were:

Henry Edward DeBoxtel, 29, of Laurel, a restaurant worker. He is married and has five children.

Clifton Eudell Lowe, 50, father of Charles Lowe. He is a painter at Laurel and has three other children.

James Franklin Lyons, 33, an employe of the Masonite Corporation at Laurel. He is married and has two stepchildren. He was arrested for car theft and burglary in 1953, but was released.

Melvin Sennett Martin, 33, a tractor operator for Masonite at Laurel. He is divorced and has one daughter. He was charged with nightriding in September and possession of dynamite in January. The charges were dropped when a Jones County grand jury refused to indict.

Emanuel Benjamin Moss, 52, a service station operator at Laurel. He is married and has five children. The F.B.I. said he had been arrested 15 to 20 times for fighting.

Charles Richard Noble, 23, an employe of Masonite at Laurel. He is married and has two children.

Billy Ry Pitts, 22, employed by his father at Pitts Auto Trim at Laurel. He is married and has two children. He was arrested for grand larceny in Copiah County, Miss., in 1959 and placed on probation.

William Ray Smith, 28, an ejmploye of Masonite in Laurel. He has been married tiwce and is the father of three children.

The F.B.I. has charged that the White Knights were involved in the murder of three civil rights workers near Philadelphia, Miss., during the summer of 1964.

Two White Knights members were charged, and later released, in the killing of two Negro youths whose bodies were found in the Mississippi River near Meadville the same summer. Staff investigators for the House Committee on Un-American Activities testified during this winter's Klan hearings—when members of the White Knights invoked the self incrimination protection of the Fifth Amendment and refused to testify—that the killings had been engineered by the White Knights.

The organization has about 500 members, down from its peak of 2,000 two years ago, the F.B.I. estimates.

White leaders of Hattiesburg, where Klan membership is small, were outaged by the Dahmer killing. They raised a memorial fund to rebuild the home.

Mr. Dahmer owned, in addition to a four-bedroom brick house, a grocery store, a small lumber mill and 200 acres of land.

The day before his death, he announced on the radio that he would collect money from Negroes to pay the poll tax for this year's elections.

Doomed Negro Loses Appeal in Rape Case

WASHINGTON, March 28 (AP)—The Supreme Court denied today a hearing to a Florida Negro who said the death penalty had been used as an instrument of discrimination against members of his race convicted of raping white women.

A hearing was asked by William Benjamin Craig, convicted in the Circuit Court in Leon County, Fla., on June 27, 1963. He was sentended to die for the rape of a white woman. Craig later asked that the sentence be reduced to life imprisonment or less, but this was denied.

Craig's appeal to the Supreme Court said that in the 25-year period ended June 31, 1964, 54 men had been sentenced to death in Florida for rape. Forty-eight of them were Negroes.

The appeal said that imposition of the death sentence for rape amounts to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Constitution.

13 Mississippi Klansmen Seized in Negro's Death

Vtd 8/29/66

By ROY REED
Special to The New York Times

HATTIESBURG, Miss., March 28—The Federal Bureau of Investigation arrested 13 men and sought a 14th today on Federal charges of violating the civil rights of a prosperous Negro leader who was slain by fire bombs near here Jan. 10.

They were identified by J. Edgar Hoover, director of the F.B.I., as members and leaders of the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. The White Knights have the reputation of being the most violent Klan group in the South. Federal investigative agencies have implicated the organization in six civil rights murders in less than two years.

Sam Holloway Bowers Jr. of Laurel, the man still being sought, is the Imperial Wizard of the White Knights. F.B.I. sources said he was "armed and dangerous."

Lawyers Retained

Dudley Conner of Hattiesburg, one of three lawyers retained by the 13 men, declined to identify his clients as Klan members.

"As far as I know," he said, "they are just 13 American citizens who have been seized by the F.B.I."

The Government complaint charges the 14 men with violating the civil rights of Vernon F. Dahmer, 58 years old, a former president of the Forrest County branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Mr. Dahmer and his family were awakened at 2 A.M. Jan. 10 by gunfire and a series of "Molotov cocktail" explosions. He made his way through the flames and fired his shotgun at one of the nightriders' cars. He died of burns 13 hours later.

The arrested men face up to 15 years in prison. They are charged with violating a section of the 1965 Voting Rights

Warn of Inflation on Eve of a Test Vote in the House on Great Society Funds

By DAVID S. BRODER
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 28—The leadership of the Republican party set the stage today for the first major fiscal battle of the election-year Congress by charging that Johnson Administration policies have brought the nation to the "threshold of dangerous inflation."

The Republican Coordinating Committee called for sharp cuts in non-defense spending to bring the budget into balance and avoid the need for additional tax increases this year.

The unanimous declaration of the G. O. P. Congressional leaders, major governors, party officials and past Presidential candidates came on the eve of the first clear test of sentiment in the House of Representatives on spending for Great Society programs.

Republican leaders in the House have served notice that they will try to pare about $200-million from a $2.5-billion supplemental appropriation bill scheduled for action tomorrow.

Particular targets are $12-million to start the rent-supplement program and $10-million to start a Teachers' Corps.

Conspiracy in Slayings Laid To Mississippi Klansman

AG 3/31/66 P42

By The Associated Press

A Ku Klux Klansman whose statement aided in getting indictments in connection with the slaying of three civil rights workers in Mississippi will face conspiracy charges here.

U.S. District Attorney Charles L. Goodson said James Edward Jordan will be called to formally answer charges of conspiring to deprive persons of their civil rights.

Jordan, 40, was arrested in January, 1965, in connection with the slaying of Michael Schwerner, 24, and Andrew Goodman, 20, both white and of New York, and James Chaney, 20, a Meridian Negro.

The three had driven from Meridian, Miss., to Philadelphia, Miss., June 21, 1964, to investigate a burned Negro church and they disappeared.

Their bodies were found beneath an earthen dam after federal, county and state officials —along with Navy personnel— searched throughout Neshoba County, Miss.

Goodson said Jordan had not appeared before a district judge since his arrest because the 1870 law making it a crime to conspire to oppress Negroes was under court attack.

The Supreme Court ruled in the matter Monday and held the law was applicable for the arrests of Jordan and the other 17 men who were indicted under the law.

When Jordan was arrested, the FBI identified him as an admitted member of the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan.

Jordan, and Horace Doyle Barnett of Shreveport, La., gave statements in the case, officials said, and Mississippi officials repeatedly tried without success to get a copy of Jordan's statement for litigation.

A federal attorney in Goodson's office said there has been no trial date set for Jordan, who was arrested in Gulfport, Miss., and spirited away by federal officers pending his testifying before a federal grand jury.

Barnett had given a statement in the case and the government attempted to use it to have a group of Philadelphia area men taken into custody, but U.S. Commissioner Esther Carter ruled the statement inadmissable, thereby prompting the Justice department to go to the grand jury.

Goodson said Jordan would ordinarily have to face charges in Mississippi, where the civil rights workers were killed. Goodson said, however, Jordan entered a plea of no contest to the charges during an arraignment before U.S. Commisisoner Frank A. Holden here Jan. 28, 1965.

VIRGINIA

Fast Va. Action Seen On Local Sales Tax

RICHMOND, April 12 (AP) —An official of the Virginia Association of Counties predicted today at least 75 per cent of all Virginia localities will adopt a 1 per cent local sales tax this year.

C. F. Hicks of Glouster, legal counsel for the Association, said he based his figure on informational meetings on the new State sales tax and on talks with officials around the State.

Hicks, answering a newsman's query, said the response to the new tax was "greater than what I had thought it would be" when the 1966 General Assembly adopted the statewide 2 per cent levy and 1 per cent local option.

He said he believed much of the response is because of acceptance of the idea that the optional tax can be used as a means of lowering real estate taxes and eliminating the personal property tax on household goods.

At the same time, Hicks noted that some localities—notably in the areas of Washington, Danville and Central Virginia — are resisting the move toward the optional levy.

Hicks said he believed there are two reasons for the lack of enthusiasm for the tax in the Washington and Danville areas:

- In both areas, nearby localities already had a 3 per cent sales tax and local officials apparently hopted that retention of a 2 per cent sales tax would be a boon to local business firms.
- Neither area apparently is in great need of revenue at present.

So far, only a handful of localities have given formal approval to the local option. But several others have indicated they favor it and have scheduled public hearings.

Integration In Hospitals Attacked

RICHMOND, April 12 (AP) A Virginia hospital official says he "profoundly disagrees with the methods the Federal Government is using" to enforce the Civil Rights Act as it applies to hospitals.

Stuart Ogren, executive secretary of the Virginia Hospital Association, said yesterday the Department of Health, Education and Welfare is pushing the rights issue too far.

As Ogren spoke, 22 Federal agents were spread out over five southern states in search of violations of the 1964 Act. He said their tactics will "influence some hospitals to forget medicare and other welfare programs."

Ogren said the equal care provision of the Act "means the individual is no longer able to define his own privacy in a hospital," in a reference to an "enforced mixing of patients of different races."

The Government has threatened to withhold Federal aid to the hospitals if patients of all races are not provided equal care.

3 Primary Fights Certain in Virginia

WP 4/14/66

Three Democratic congressional primaries in Virginia, including two in the Washington suburbs, were in prospect as yesterday's filing deadline drew to a close.

One of the last candidates to qualify was Thomas H. Woods, a Falls Church travel agency operator, who will challenge Del. Clive DuVal (D-Fairfax-Falls Church) in the 10th District primary.

Woods' petition was accepted by 10th District Democratic Vice Chairman Flora Crater despite earlier doubt over whether he would have sufficient signatures.

The 10th District is currently held by Rep. Joel T. Broyhill (R-Va.), who is expected to seek a ninth term.

In the 8th District, which was reapportioned last year to include part of Fairfax County, a two-way race was assured when a third prospective candidate, John S. Barrett, a Stafford County pharmacist, dropped out.

Previously in the race were Rep. Howard W. Smith (D-Va.), seeking his 19th term, and Del. George C. Rawlings Jr. (D-Fredericksburg). Barrett said he would support Rawlings in the primary.

The Democratic contest will be held July 12. The filing deadline was last midnight.

Lewis A. Curling, a Chesapeake attorney and last-minute entrant against Rep. Watkins N. Abbitt (D-Va.) in the 4th District, was racing the clock to make it.

Because it was a State holiday (Jefferson's birthday), it took intercession from the Governor's office to find someone to whom Gurling could pay his filing fee and then he had to race to Waverly, Va., to get his papers to 4th District Chairman Garland Gray.

Already qualified for the State's first double-barrelled U.S. Senate primary in more than a half century were Sens. Harry F. Byrd Jr. and A. Willis Robertson (D-Va.) and their respective challengers, former Alexandria State Sen. Armistead L. Boothe and Portsmouth State Sen. William B. Spong.

There was no Democrat in sight shortly before the deadline in the 6th District, now represented by Rep. Richard H. Poff (R-Va.) The other Democratic Congressman will be unopposed in the primary.

AN

PENN, MRS. LIUZZIO MURDER CASES

Sadness Stalks 7 in Slayings

By JACK NELSON
Los Angeles Times News Service

Death, insanity, fear, criminal charges and family trouble have plagued principals in two of the nation's most notorious civil rights murder cases.

Affected have been the four Ku Klux Klansmen who were accused of slaying Lemuel Penn of Washington, and the three klansmen accused of killing Mrs. Viola Liuzzo, a volunteer in civil rights work.

An eighth klansman, Mathew H. Murphy Jr., who served as defense counsel in the first of three trials held in the Liuzzo case, died in a car crash.

Penn, an Army Reserve lieutenant colonel, was killed by a shotgun blast July 11, 1964, as he and two other Negro Reserve officers drove through Madison County, Ga., en route to Washington from military training at Ft. Benning.

Charged with murder after a lengthy FBI investigation were four Athens klansmen — Joseph Howard Sims, 43; Cecil William Myers, 28; Howard Guest, 39, and James S. Lackey, 30.

AN ALL-WHITE jury in Madison County freed Sims and Myers of the murder charges. Guest and Lackey have never been tried. All four still face felony charges under an 1870 federal statute (recently held constitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court) of violating Penn's civil rights.

Since the Madison trial, Sims and Myers, wearing black shirts with military officers' emblems on the shoulders and calling themselves Black Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, frequently have been seen armed at klan rallies and have turned up at such civil rights trouble spots as Americus and Crawfordville, Ga.

Both have been arrested on assault and disturbance charges in connection with incidents involving civil rights demonstrations.

On May 6, Sims, who has been unemployed since the trial, stalked into an Athens hospital where his estranged wife worked as a nurse's aide and shot her in the face, police said. Mrs. Sims, 35, mother of eight, was not injured critically.

Sims, who said his wife left him because he was a "good for nothing," was charged with assault with intent to murder. Last Thursday he was committed to the State Mental Hospital at Milledgeville as a "suicidal and homicidal paranoid."

MYERS, who has been unemployed most of the time since the trial, has been sued for nonsupport by his wife, a mother of four.

Guest and his wife, Blanche, a klanswoman at the time of the trial, have stayed away from klan activities since then and have operated a rather profitable garage. She bosses the business.

Guest's most recent run-in with the law involves a charge of violating the federal Pure Food and Drug Act. He is accused of selling pep pills (amphetamine).

Lackey, who according to testimony by a psychiatrist, has a "borderline mentality" with an IQ of about 90, went into virtual seclusion at his family's chicken farm near Clermont in North Georgia after the trial, according to a federal source. He reportedly fears that other klansmen might harm him.

A written confession from Lackey, implicating Sims, Myers and Guest in the Penn killing, was the FBI's major piece of evidence in the case. Lackey repudiated the confession, but it was read to the jury and evidence corroborating major points of it was introduced by the prosecution.

MRS. LIUZZO was killed by pistol fire March 25, 1965, as she drove through Lowndes County en route to Montgomery to pick up demonstrators who had participated in the five-day voting rights March from Selma.

The next day the FBI filed charges of violating Mrs. Liuzzo's civil rights against four persons — Collie Leroy Wilkins, 21; William Orville Eaton, 42; Eugene Thomas, 43, and Gary Tommy Rowe Jr., 35.

All four were identified as klansmen, but later it was revealed that Rowe actually was an undercover agent who had joined the klan at the request of the FBI. The federal charges against him were dropped and state murder charges were brought against the other three men.

Wilkins, the only one to be tried on the murder charge, was defended by klan attorney Murphy, whose racist appeals to an all-white jury included the charge that "Communists and the niggers have taken us over."

The jury deadlocked and a mistrial was declared. Klansmen hailed it as a victory and Murphy and Wilkins made a road show of the Liuzzo case, attending klan rallies as honored guests and speakers from Alabama to North Carolina.

On Aug. 19, about two weeks before a second trial was scheduled, Murphy fell asleep driving his car and it slammed into a tanker truck. He was killed.

A SECOND Lowndes jury acquitted Wilkins last September, but three months later he, Eaton and Thomas were sentenced to 10 years each after a federal jury at Montgomery found them guilty of violating an 1872 civil rights statute.

They were freed on appeal bonds, but federal authorities jailed Wilkins for a year on grounds he violated provisions of a probationary term by going out of the court's jurisdiction to attend the out-of-state klan rallies. He had been sentenced originally upon conviction of possessing an unlawful weapon.

On March 9 Eaton, father of five children, died of a heart attack.

Last month, Thomas was convicted and sentenced to two years on a federal charge of possessing an unlawful weapon — a sawed-off shotgun seized at his house after his arrest in the Liuzzo case.

A murder trial for Thomas in the Liuzzo case had been scheduled to be called Monday, but it was postponed indefinitely after a federal official disclosed that FBI informer Rowe would not testify again.

Rowe has remained in hiding, often under FBI protection, since the Liuzzo case.

The emotional stress of testifying at length at the three different trials that have been held in the case, the Hayneville exoneration of Wilkins, who, he had testified, fired the fatal shot, and the necessity of changing his own identity and appearance to guard against reprisal by the klan apparently left Rowe unwilling to testify further.

A federal official said Rowe "has had a belly full."

2 Pals Killed Negro, Says Klansman

AC 6/18/66

NATCHEZ, Miss. (UPI) — An alleged Ku Klux Klanman who said we couldn't live with his conscience said Friday his two companions shot a 65-year-old Negro to death last week on a lonely country road.

James L. Jones, 56, said the victim, Ben Chester White, screamed "Oh, Lord, what I done to deserve this?" seconds before two alleged klansmen opened fire on him.

Jones, 56, was testifying at a preliminary hearing on Claude Fuller, 46, identified by the House Committee on Un-American Activities as a Klansman.

Jones said they he watched Fuller and Ernest Avants, 35, kill White last Friday and dump his riddled body in Pretty Creek. Jones said he didn't know why they did it.

Avants' hearing began after Fuller's. Jones, the state's key witness, had a brief, closed preliminary hearing earlier this week and was rushed to a jail in Jackson for safekeeping.

Jury in Mississippi Indicts 15 Klansmen In Killing of Negro

NYT
V+D 6/24/66

By United Press International

BILOXI, Miss., June 23 (UPI) —A Federal grand jury has returned indictments against 15 alleged Ku Klux Klansmen in connection with the firebomb slaying of a Hattiesburg, Miss., Negro leader last January.

The indictments were returned yesterday by the 23-member biracial panel but were kept secret until today pending the arrest of the 15th suspect. The 14 others were arrested earlier and are free on bond.

The latest to be charged in the case was identified as Mordauant William Hamilton Sr., 58 years old, the owner of a Hattiesburg hardware store. He was arrested this morning in Hattiesburg and taken before United States Commissioner Jack Pittman.

Two-Count Indictment

All 15 were charged with two counts of violating a section of the United States Code in connection with the death of Vernon Dahmer last Jan. 10. The indictments came under the Voting Rights Act of 1965 concerning the right to vote.

Mr. Dahmer, a former branch president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, was fatally burned when nightriders hurled firebombs into his home and grocery outside Hattiesburg.

Among those indicted was Sam H. Bowers Jr., identified by the Federal Bureau of Investigation as the imperial wizard of the White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan of Mississippi. The bureau said all but Hamilton were members of the White Knights, one of the most secretive and militant Klan groups in the nation.

Federal authorities said Hamilton was a member of the White Knights until the fall of 1964 when he switched to the United Klans after an argument with Bowers over finances.

Coercion Charged

The indictments accused the group of conspiring to "intimidate, threaten and coerce" Mr. Dahmer and other Negroes for voting, attempting to vote and urging other Negroes to vote in Mississippi elections.

The jury said it was "part of the plan and purpose of the conspiracy" to go to the Dahmer grocery "and to shoot guns and set fire to the house and grocery store." The second count accused the group of actually setting fire to the grocery and firing guns at the store.

The indictments were voted after a 2½-day investigation by the grand jury, composed of 17 whites and six Negroes. The panel was sworn in Monday by Federal District Judke W. Harold Cox.

No date was set for the trial of the 15 white men.

Thirteen of those indicted were arrested in March by the F.B.I. Bowers, who eluded capture, turned himself in later. All were residents or former residents of the Laurel area.

They were bound over to the grand jury by Commissioner Pittman and freed on bond.

Testify on Meeting

At a preliminary hearing before the Commissioner, F.B.I. agents told of a clandestine meeting in a swamp near Hattiesburg where Bowers allegedly ordered the attack against Mr. Dahmer. Investigators testified six of the suspects had given statements implicating the others in a plot to "stop" Mr. Dahmer because he was "getting too many Niggers to vote."

Besides Bowers and Hamilton, those indicted included:

Deavours Nix, 40, a Laurel restaurant owner and alleged head of the White Knights' investigation bureau; Lawrence Byrd, 44, owner of a Laurel radio and television repair shop; Henry E. De Boxtel, 29, Laurel, restaurant employe; Howard Travis Giles, 37, Ellisville, a cafe operator; Clifton Eudell Lowe, 50, Laurel, a carpenter; Charles Lamar Lowe, 23, Laurel; James Franklin Lyons, 33, Laurel; Melvin Sennett Martin, 33, Laurel; Emanrel, part-time carpenter; Charles Richard Noble, 23, Laurel; Billy Roy Pitts, 22, Laurel, an employe of an auto trim shop; Cecil Victor Sessum, 30, Ellisville, a welder, and William Ray Smith, 28, Laurel.

"What is a Primary Election," asked Carolyn Patterson, a sophomore at R. R. Moton High School.

A primary election is part of the electoral system in the United States by which candidates for local, state and national offices are nominated. In the primary election, such as the one to be held in Virginia on July 12, the voters will decide which candidates of the Democratic Party will run in the general election in November. For instance, Armistead Booth is running against Harry F. Byrd, Jr., in the primary election. After the election in July, one of these men will run against a candidate chosen by the Republican Party. These men are running for the United States Senate.

Dr. C. G. Moss, a history professor at Longwood College taught Armistead Booth, a candidate for the U.S. Senate, at Episcopal High School, in Alexandria, Virginia. Booth was Dr. Moss's student between 1921 and 1924.

At that time, Episcopal High School had about 200 boarding students and some day students. Armistead Booth was one of the day students.

Dr. Moss said, "I always remembered him as a clean cut intelligent boy and have remembered him ever since."

Booth attended the University of Virginia and the University of Virginia Law School. From there, he was awarded a Rhodes Scholarship and studied at Oxford University in England.

In 1948, he was elected to the Virginia State legislature. He first served in the House of Delegates and then in the Virginia legislature.

During the late 1940's and and early 1950's Aristead Booth was called "a young turk," meaning a liberal who opposed the Byrd machine in Virginia.

After the Supreme Court decision of 1954 supporting school desegregation, he proposed a freedom of choice plan for school desegregation. This was killed by

L.F. Griffin Urges 'Disrupting Religion'

By O. Jerome Jackson

"Disrupting Religion" was the topic of an unusual sermon given by the Rev. L. F. Griffin, Sr., pastor of the First Baptist Church in Farmville, Va., on Easter Sunday. This is a topic not generally thought of in the rural South.

Rev. Griffin's sermon was mainly concerned with the role of religion in our society and the concept that many people still have of religion.

Rev. Griffin said that, "a tragic thing about Christian religion was that we have more people now than ever and have still failed to establish universal brotherhood. We are still emptying money into war and there are children all over the world starving."

On God in Our Lives

Some of us still have the concept of "old time religion", Rev. Griffin told his congreation. What is old time religion? Some think we are going to be glorified.

"Are you satisified with that by emotional outbursts in religious ceremonies, he said.

A man's religion is measured by his willingness to sacrifice, not by how often he goes to church, Rev. Griffin continued.

Many of us want a universal "bell-hop" that will sacrifice for us. We want a God who will "make a way" instead one helping us to make a way.

"We want a God," Rev. Griffin stated, "not whose way we are going, but who's going our way. We don't feel identified with anyone but ourselves. We open the doors on Sunday with no provisions for Monday," he added.

"This is a very controversial issue to which more and more clegymen and Christians are today searching for answers. We need answers!!! Think about it. "It will mean more to you than you think," Rev. Griffin said.

"Are you satisfied with that mild concept of religion? Or do you want to disrupt yours?", Rev. Griffin asked.

By Pheaby Dupey

Armistead L. Boothe of Alexandria is a candidate for the U.S. Senate from Virginia. He is running against Harry F. Byrd, Jr., who was appointed to the senate in November, 1965.

Former State Senator Boothe has been called an excellent campaigner, with good platform presence and the ability to express himself well. Mr. Boothe stands for the liberal viewpoint in contrast to the conservatism of Mr. Byrd who viewpoints are similar to those of his father, Harry F. Byrd, Sr. For instance, Mr. Boothe has worked against programs and laws such as those which closed schools in Prince Edward County.

While in the Virginia Legislature, Boothe was classified as a "militant moderate." This means he advocated positive state action rather than Federal government involvement in local affairs. He also supports advances in education and industrial development.

Armistead Boothe is best remembered for his hard fight after 1954 to keep open the public schools in Virginia. He was one

Also leaflets were passed out on desegregation. Parents in the county received forms on which they could choose which school their children could attend. The purpose of this new plan is to eliminate from the schools racial segregation and all other forms of discrimination based on color.

In Lunenburg Country, 16 Negroes attend white schools. Mr. Hawthorne also stated that when Negroes were applying to all-white schools that the superintendent gave them two weeks to return the forms, which the Negro people felt was too little time.

Mr. Hawthorne spoke at a meeting held in Richmond on April 9 concerning "the choice of schools". He also spoke on "difficulties the Negro students have in the rural sections."

Moton Handicaps Students

In the last issue of THE VOICE, an editorial contained a few statements that weren't completely factual. One of these concerned our library. Our opinion about the books being in poor conditions was wrong. Perhaps we should have talked about the quality of the books and our feeling that a number of the library books are out-of-date and need to be replaced.

Also, we stated that there were no higher math courses in the school. Perhaps we should have said that there aren't enough high math courses. At the present time, there is one trigonometry class and one class in advanced high school mathematics. This last class is offered without credit to about ten students, and was started sometime in March.

The administration says that all a student has to do is ask for a course. How does this justify our not having them? As students at R. R. Moton, we ask that more courses such as those mentioned in this and in past editorials be offered next year!

When can we take our Negro 1963. These students need special attention in order to come up to about their grade level. This cannot be done in a class of 30 students. We think the school and county officials should make an attempt to make classes smaller. For instance, in a class with as few as 20 students, 10 may need special, individual attention. This is impossible for the teacher. Groupng students and class size are special problems in a school system with ENORMOUS problems.

However, the main point of our last editorial was that above average students at R. R. Moton are being cheated. In all the discussion which the last editorial caused, we heard NO answer to this opinion. Instead, criticisms were heaped upon us for small factual errors. We have explained the areas in which we were incorrect. Will someone please answer the question raised in the last editorial? "In our opinion, students who graduate from Robert R. Let's take a moment to sum up a situation in which we, as Prince Edward Countians can take no pride. Is it really true, that in this county the democratic processes have crumbled until the milk of human kindness is no longer practiced as a virtue belonging to the human race?

How can one human being take from another knowingly, when the need is so apparent in all areas?

Just to enlighten you a bit, please follow:

To get one Visiting Teacher, one principal was eliminated, and the other principal was given the job of this principal. For three (3) years the services of this principal whose job was eliminated were necessary. Economically who is suffering? Will there be a new principal appointed?

The plot thickens as we glide deeper into the injustices. One Director of Instructions was secured for this system. No qualified person could be found of the pre-dominant group of this school system to be appointed (Ed. note: the new director of instructions is white). As we look around us, we see far and near persons with the same educational offerings, more experience, and a thorough knowledge of the needs of the people.

When can we take our Negro History Course, our creative writing course, our journalism courses? When?

When can we join the debate team, the drama club? When?

Another part of our editorial needing explanation is the problem of over-crowded classes. In the Prince Edward case, since public schools here were closed for five years, most students missed school for four years until the Free Schools opened in 1963. These students need special attention in order to come up to about their grade level. This cannot be done in a class of 30 students. We think the school and county officials should make an attempt to make classes smaller. For instance, in a class with as few as 20 students, 10 may need special, individual attention. Another question—"If the students of Prince Edward County are blocked from having a good education will they, even with a diploma, still be locked out of opportunities needed to lead a decent life?"

Will someone, school administrators, county school officials, teachers, parents PLEASE answer this? Does anyone, school administrators, county school officials, teachers, parents care about this school system?

Poverty Is For The Poor

Sometime last year, the war on Poverty entered Prince Edward County. The War on Poverty was responsible for running the project "Operation Catch-up" held here to teach remedial reading. "Operation Catch-up" was planned after many months of hard work by a committee of local citizens who saw a great need for such a project.

The War on Poverty in this county, Prince Edward Community Action Group, Inc., has some 69 members. Since the first few open meetings of the group last Spring, there have been no public meetings of Prince Edward's War on Poverty.

Some of the leadership of PECAG, Inc., is composed of people who have been opponents for many years in the Prince Edward County school fight. For instance, how does a person who holds a position of some authority in the private, segregated Prince Edward Academy also hold a position of authority in a local fight on poverty? What does such a person know of poverty?

Late last year, an adult education project was started here to teach reading. This is good—this project has been needed for sometime. But, is this what the people want? Who asked them? When were they asked? Now, this project has been discontinued. Why? Is is right for the Prince Edward Community Action Group to start a program, provide a FEW jobs for some people in this county and then stop the project?

To date, there has been little involvement of the poor in Prince Edward County's War on Poverty. In a county where 79.1% of the Negro population and 31.9% of the white population earn less than $3,000 a year, could it be that poor people are hard to find? Or, is anyone looking? When do the poor of this county have the opportunity to request projects and programs they making an effort to involve the poor whites of this county in the War on Poverty? Why have there been no poor whites involved in poverty projects?

In our opinion, if the war on Poverty in Prince Edward County makes no more effort to reach the people than has been done in the past, then the War on Poverty here will be a cruel joke on the people. Poverty in Prince Edward County will be for the poor since everything else here appears to be against them.

Youth chairman in each district are helping James and Mr. Scott in the voter registration drive. James is chairman of Farmville District and the Town of Farmville. Co-chairmen of Hampden District are Barbara Botts and Larry Hines. Eunice Dove is chairman of Lockett District. Arlean Winkler is chairman of the youth working in Leigh District. Gloria Berryman is chairman in Buffalo District and Harold White, Prospect District.

Workers in the "Push for 1,200" are providing rides into Farmville for people who want to register to vote. The Registrar's office in the county courthouse is open on Mondays and Fridays from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

How do people register to vote? Mr. Scott says that because of the new laws, people do not have to pay their poll tax in order to register. Also, under the new laws, people do not have to be able to read or write in order to register. The Registrar will help all people who cannot read or write in registering to vote. All you have to do is ask for this help!

Mr. Scott urges all people who are not sure whether they are registered to vote to call 392-5745 in Farmville to have office workers check on this. If you have already registered, Mr. Scott says you do not have re-register.

The Gray Plan included pupil assignment which could mean that all Negro children could be excluded from attending all-white schools. It also included tuition grants which could be given to children attending integrated schools, so they could go to private, segregated schools.

Boothe urged the state to accept the Supreme Court's decision and he was among the Legislative leaders who helped steer Virginia from a course of massive resistance to school integration to the present freedom of choice policy.

Some spoke out against the moderate legislators. However, the State Senator Armistead L. Boothe and Republican State Senator Ted Dalton working as a team, made a valiant last ditch fight for local option in a session of the legislature. At one point in the fight, Boothe was acting chairman of the Virginia Society for the Preservation of Public Education.

County in Virginia Is Held in Contempt Over White Tuitions

NYT 6/20/66

RICHMOND, June 20 (AP) —The Board of Supervisors of Prince Edward county was cited for civil contempt by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit here today for paying out $180,000 in tuition grants to parents of white school children.

The court made the 3-to-2 ruling against a county action that Negro plaintiffs had called "a midnight raid on the county treasury." It ordered the $180,000 restored to the treasury.

Prince Edward, the only locality in the nation to abandon public schools rather than desegrate them, distributed the money on Aug. 5, 1964. The money was for use in a private school system for the county's white children.

In the majority opinion written by Justice Albert V. Bryan, the court said:

"Obviously, the aim was to thwart the impact of any adverse decree which might ultimately be forthcoming on the use of tuition grants."

The money was distibruted while the appeals court was considering a request for a permanent injunction against the use of tuition grants.

The payments represented one-half of the total amount of the tuition grants for the 1964-65 school year. White parents were notified by telephone in the early morning hours of Aug. 5 and, the court noted, most of them received the money at 9 o'clock that morning.

Public schools were closed in the county in 1959 to avoid racial desegregation. The county's white children attended a quickly organized private academy, but Negroes received no formal education until the Kennedy Administration promoted the formation of a private foundation for them in 1963.

BANKERS' SUPPORT ISSUE IN VIRGINIA

Aid to Senator Robertson Is Cited by Rival's Backers

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

RICHMOND, Va., June 15—When William B. Spong Jr., a candidate for the United States Senate, is in Richmond he frequently makes hand-shaking forays into the financial district on Main Street, where the bank buildings are high and shiny.

A large banner stretched across the street is a reminder that this sector of the Virginia establishment is enemy territory for Mr. Spong, a 45-year-old state Senator from Portsmouth.

The banner urges the re-election of A. Willis Robertson, the 79-year-old conservative who is chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee.

The best that Mr. Spong has done on Main Street is to come away with the support of some lower rung employes who like his scholarly, straightforward approach and the way he says that Senator Robertson is "a member of a small band who refuse to recognize the problems of the 20th century."

Spong Draws Strength

Recent disclosures of the assistance that the banking industry has been giving Mr. Robertson in the Senate race, however, seem to have added more steam to the surprisingly strong campaign Mr. Spong is waging to win the July 12 Democratic primary.

Many political observers of Virginia say that Mr. Spong now has a fair chance of unseating Senator Robertson, a member of the Byrd political organization, who has been in Congress since 1933.

To the surprise of many, the race is getting much more attention than a parallel contest between Senator Harry F. Byrd Jr., who was appointed last year to fill his father's seat, and Armistead L. Boothe of Alexandria, a former member of the General Assembly.

The disclosures of campaign assistance by bankers for Senator Robertson began a few days ago when Dr. Russell M. Cox, a Portsmouth physician, who is a friend of Mr. Spong, disclosed that he had resigned from the advisory board of the Bank of Virginia because banking interests were using "coercion and arm twisting tactics" to raise money for the Robertson campaign.

Dr. Cox, a member of the Byrd organization, said that the Virginia Bankers Associa-

To the surprise of many, the race is getting much more attention than a parallel contest between Senator Harry F. Byrd Jr., who was appointed last year to fill his father's seat, and Armistead L. Boothe of Alexandria, a former member of the General Assembly.

The disclosures of campaign assistance by bankers for Senator Robertson began a few days ago when Dr. Russell M. Cox, a Portsmouth physician, who is a friend of Mr. Spong, disclosed that he had resigned from the advisory board of the Bank of Virginia because banking interests were using "coercion and arm twisting tactics" to raise money for the Robertson campaign.

Dr. Cox, a member of the Byrd organization, said that the Virginia Bankers Association had set a quota of $54,000 or more from member banks and in one bank officers and board members had been told to contribute $2,500 each.

At the same time, newspapers printed copies of a letter sent to stockholders in the Manufacturers Hanover Trust Company of New York urging them to thank Senator Robertson for legislation that had permitted a merger between the Manufacturers Trust Company and the Hanover Bank, both of New York.

The letter, which went to about 200 stockholders in Virginia as well as several thousand elsewhere, was written by R. E. McNeill Jr., chairman of the board.

Legislation Aided Bank

Senator Robertson was the sponsor of a bill enacted last year that exempted from antitrust action bank mergers consumated before June 17, 1963. The legislation had the effect of setting aside a Federal Court ruling that the New York merger had violated the Sherman Antitrust act.

Banking interests are concerned that if Senator Robertson is defeated the new chairman may be Senator Paul H. Douglas, the Illinois liberal who is third-ranking Democrat on the committee.

Senator John J. Sparkman of Alabama ranks ahead of Mr. Douglas but faces serious Republican opposition in November.

It was disclosed also that Charles Emmett Lucey, who served as counsel for Manufacturers Hanover last year and who was a registered lobbyist for a banking group, had been hired on a temporary basis as a "research assistant" for Senator Robertson.

---

Bank Won't Comment

Neither Manufacturers Hanover Trust nor Mr. McNeill would comment yesterday on the letter asking stockholders to thank Senator Robertson. The text of the letter, dated Feb. 24, 1966, follows:

"As you know, Congress passed the bank legislation which will terminate the antitrust legislation against your bank.

"The original bill to correct the situation following the Supreme Court decision on the bank merger act was introduced by Senator A. Willis Robertson of Virginia. Senator Robertson has been an outstanding Chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, and instrumental in many pieces of bank legislation. He is a man of individual opinion, but a student and knowledgeable in the field of banking, and felt very keenly that the situation in which some 2,000 banks found themselves following the Supreme Court decision should be corrected. He therefore proceeded to act accordingly.

"While many of us often ask our Senators and Representatives to consider our point of view and be helpful, many of us do not always remember to say "Thank you." We believe that Senator Robertson, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C. would like to know that you appreciated his attitude and his efforts."

Smith, Robertson Beaten in Virginia As Sen. Byrd Wins

VIRGINIA

AC 7/13/66

By JOHN F. DAFFRON

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — The conservative Byrd political organization suffered two major setbacks with the defeat of Sen. A. Willis Robertson and Rep. Howard W. Smith in Tuesday's Democratic primary election.

Sen. Harry F. Byrd Jr. staved off an organization rout by scoring a close victory in the face of a tough challenge from a former State Senate colleague, Armistead L. Boothe.

Robertson, a 20-year senator wtih a dozen years prior experience in the House, was edged by a moderate, State Sen. William B. Spong Jr., on the basis of virtually complete returns. Robertson is 79, Spong is 45.

CONTEST TALKED

But the razor-thin margin of the defeat of Robertson and Smith on the basis of the unofficial returns raised the probability of the results being contested. Only a few hundred votes each separated the winner from the loser in the two races.

Smith, 83, chairman of the House Rules Committee and a pillar of Southern conservatism, was sidetracked in his bid for a 19th term by a Virginia rarity — an avowed liberal — George C.. Rawlings Jr., a Fredericksburg attorney who serves in the Virginia Legislature.

Returns — 99 per cent complete — from 2,043 of the state's 2,063 precincts show: Robertson, 216,336; Spong 216,833; Byrd 221,435; Boothe 213,154.

THE BREAKDOWN

Unofficial complete returns from the Smith-Rawlings House race in the central Virginia 8th District showed: Smith, 26,521, Rawlings 26,885.

With less than a single percentage point separating the winners and losers in the Robertson-Spong and Smith-Rawlings races there was a likelihood of requests for a recount — but there was no immediate indication from the apparent losers themselves that this would be done.

Byrd Jr., with only eight months seniority in the Senate since his appointment to succeed his ailing father — ailing patriarch of the organization — thus is in line to become Virginia's senior senator.

IS GRATEFUL

When the results were conclusive, Byrd left his Winchester home and went with his wife and sons to a hotel ballroom. He told his supporters "I am very grateful" and said he would endeavor to continue to represent all of the people.

His campaign associates said he would have a formal statement Wednesday.

The outcome of the primary obviously will tend to reshape Virginia's staunchly conservative image in Washington. And the results portend a thaw in the chilly relations between the top Democratic leadership in Virginia and the national Democratic administration.

Another organization stalwart, Rep. Watkins M. Abbitt, state Democratic chairman, had opposition from a virtual unknown, Lewis A. Curling, and was a runaway winner for renomination in the 4th District.

In the only other primary contest, Clive L. Du Vai II, a northern Virginia attorney, defeated Thomas H. Woods, a Falls Church travel agent, for the nomination in the 10th, now represented by Republican Joel T. Broyhill.

The outcome of the Robertson fight for the full six-year Senate term was something of an upset —although the attorney, 45, had been given a good chance to turn the trick.

But the main surprise was the defeat of Smith, who was much more of an inner circle figure in the Byrd organization that Robertson has ever been. And Smith, something of a conservative's conservative, fell before the challenge of an avowed liberal.

Byrd Jr., who broke off his campaigning a few days ago when the condition of his seriously ill father became critical, was heavily favored over Boothe. But Boothe, a former state senator with Byrd, pressed him all the way. Boothe too, curtailed his campaigning in deference to his opponent's family concern.

Spong, and Boothe ran about two to one ahead of Robertson and Byrd in the populous Norfolk and northern Virginia areas and well ahead in the southwest 9th—as they knew they had to do to have a chance. And both challengers took the coastal 1st District narrowly and were strong losing contenders in the north central 8th.

WHAT PICTURE OF AMERICA?

--- EXPERIENCES OF FOREIGN STUDENTS (Studying in the U.S.A.)

FOREWARD

During the summer of 1966 many students from different parts of the U.S.A. have worked in Amelia and Nottoway Counties through the Parish Volunteer Service Corps under the direction of The Rev. Robert L. Craghead (Pastor of the Zion Hill United Presbyterian Church, U.S.A.). Some of these students are from foreign countries and studying in America. The VCHR has obtained per mission from them to relate their impressions. VCHR asked them, "What picture of America have you obtained from your experiences in Amelia County, Virginia, U.S.A.? These are their stories:

AFFIDAVIT

I am a Ghanaian student studying Divinity at Duke Divinity School, Durham, North Carolina. Since June 23, I have been working with Amelia-Nottoway Parish Volunteer Service Corps, under The Rev. Robert L. Craghead. (Zion Hill United Presbyterian Church, U.S.A.)

On Saturday, August 13, 1966, a Freedom Rally was held under the auspices of the Amelia Branch of the NAACP, in front of the Amelia Courthouse. The rally was held in connection with Negro Voter Registration which formed part of the work I did.

The Rally scheduled at 10:00 a.m., started at 10:45 a.m. The Rev. Craghead opened it with prayer. He asked God's blessings and peace and harmony among all races regardless of color, creed or race. Miss Carolyn Brumskill spoke briefly, stating the purpose of the rally.

But before she spoke, Miss Elaine Hoisington, call my attention to a Klansman who was coming towards the Confederate Statute. She and one girl followed by Mr. Wilkerson, who led the singing of the Freedom Songs walked towards the Klansmen. They tried to take his picture. It seemed that he agreed to pose for the photo. Miss Hoisington and her group of two came back whilst the Klansman took another turn.

It was my turn to speak. In less than three or four minutes I saw a number of Klansmen in robes coming. They lined up right in front of me and faced the audience. They were about three (3) feet from me.

Though I was somewhat terrified by their presence, I did not give up my address which was on "Africa Today." I pressed on until the end. They were silent while I spoke. Mr. Randall, the Master of Ceremonies, expressed his thanks and the audience applauded.

The Klansmen, led by a certain man dressed in long pants and shirt, started shouting and yelling NEVER with some sort of rhythum. Some of them had a piece of cardboard pinned on them with NEVER printed on them. Others has in their hands leaflets and newspapers apparently for distribution.

Among the first batch, I saw about two (2) women clad in the Klan's robe and another one in in a blouse and skirt.

Just as the behavior of the klansmen did not please me, so did the way of the local peace en forcing people displease me. Whereas, the form er did all their worst with impunity, the latter seemed to have "aided and abetted." I do not think I was wrong in repeating in my head, "O judgement thou art fled to brutish beasts, and men have lost their reason." (With apologies to Shakespeare.) Somewhere in the middle of the rally, a man in his fifties who dressed like a "gentlemen" appeared on the scene. There flowed from him a force of life which affected every klansman. I heard him mutter something which encouraged the 25 to 30 klansmen and women to yell their "nevers" at their loudest. But the Negroes were not perturbed nor disturbed. They stood their ground until the klansmen moved behind the main audience. This gave the Negroes breathing space until finally the klan departed from the grounds of the courthouse. But as they were not too happy to see the rally going smooth ly, they threw a firecracker which boomed very loud. But no one was disturbed by it.

Though there was no major incident, I was very much depressed and stupified by the uncalled for interference of the klansmen. And most shock-- ing of all is that the klan is taking the name of God in vain. They think they have been ordained by God to fight for the American white society. What happened in Amelia on August 13, gives me an idea as to what depths of infamy it was possible for men (black, yellow or white) to descend.

At least, I saw about six or eight policemen the majority of whom were for the most part inside the Courthouse and peeping through the window panes. I saw that the presence of the Klansmen made Messrs. Lester Banks, Randall, Wilkerson and The Rev. Craghead move up and down, going to the Courthouse, and consulting with the peace and law enforcing officers. On one or two occasions I saw the police talking to one or two leaders of the Klansmen away from the main Klan group. There seemed to be a battle of nerves. Whenever the yelling of the NEVER went down, Mr. Wilkerson would call a Freedom Song to be sung. Sometimes there was a clash. The NEVER could continue but the volume of the freedom song would drown it. I heard the U.S. National Anthem sung twice. (By Negroes.) On the first occasion both sides ---- Negroes and Klansmen joined. On the second occa sion, Mr. Wilkerson said it should be left only to the Klan to sing. I saw two or three of them singing but they could do it only halfway. The rest stood mute.

When the first batch of Klansmen were coming, I saw that one of the men has something rather too heavy, and of the shape of a pistol in his pocket. He walked clumsily.

Before the rally was halfway through, more Klansmen and women had joined. Some in their robes, others were not. The climax came when a man in his fifties came. He was not in a Klan robe. He was in tie. He was very good in rousing the Klansmen. They yelled and shouted as he shouted something to them.

I tried to speak to Mr. Mike Barnhart by put ing my hand on his arm. Immediately one of the Klansmen shouted to him, "You Nigger-Lover!" -- Another asked me, "You, where do you come from?" I replied, "Africa." -- He then told me to go home.

I don't know what made the Klan leave their original place to an area behind the audience. Here they pressed on the people while the latter were singing their Freedom Songs.

Finally, the Klansmen in a group moved away from the Court- house grounds to a street nearby. While they were there, I saw some people rushing towards them. Something developed. Soon a Negro woman with her child accompanied by her husband was es corted in after the police had earlier escorted one of the Klansmen into the Courthouse. Mr. L. Banks was speaking when this incident happened. After a short while, a firecracker boomed aloud on the Courthouse ground. The organizers of the rally approached the police but they appeared to be indifferent to what had happened. No arrest was made. After this incident the Klansmen began to disappear one by one. The Negro Freedom Rally came to an end about 1:00 p.m.

I hereby swear and affirm that the above is true and correct to the best of my knowledge.

Never, Never, Never!
(by Daniel O. Kwapong)

I am barely one year old in this country. I have seen much and observed a lot, but my impressions are still in the melting pot. I am sure that my second year here will help me get a true picture of things, especially if I happen to have the opportunity of travelling just a little further afield. As it usually happens, one may learn so many things about a new country one is travelling to before one actually sets foot there. The pieces of information he receives before he leaves may only help excite that person's fancy. Correct impressions of a country are generally formed after a considerable stay and much observation.

Before I set foot here, some of the ideas passed on to me were really great: America is a Christian country; there is no poverty in America; every family owns a car; on the highways, if you don't travel a safe speed, the patrolman will catch you and give you a ticket. Of course, the plight of the Negro is some thing well known outside America. I knew of segregation and discrimination as social prejudices against American Negroes and occasionally against Africans by "mistake." We read about stories of Little Rock and James Meredith and a lot more. When you said hospitality is characteristic of the African, you will be told to go to America and you will find the same thing and "even more." Nor need I mention the big commitment of the U.S. to save captive nations from the claws of Communism and terrorism, countless technical assistance and aid given to underdeveloped countries "without strings," and different foundations and scholarships from churches and educational agencies to foreign students. Lastly, we hear of America as a land of liberty and home of true democracy. All these facets of American life do not exclude the high incidence of fatal accidents on the high ways and the wave of crime and violence.

As I have already said, I am barely one year old here in America and have not yet had the opportunity of travelling much. Whatever picture I have of this country is still in the making. However, there is one statement I have made as a result of what I have seen and read since coming. I have said that I am yet to be convinced that the U. S. is a Christian country. Perhaps the adjective "Christian" is used only either broadly or vaguely. Secondly, what I have to say is -- either there is too little of it or too much of it. If the Negroes have the liberty to organize a Freedom Rally and some Klansmen also have a kind of liberty to disrupt this meeting, it goes without saying that there is either too much of this freedom or too little, for good or bad.

Let us be honest. What is good for the goose is also good for the gander. So goes the adage. If in the name of humanity, the Negro is a human being, and the white man is also a human being; then both of them by simple deduction are human beings. It is with the common nature of humanity between Negroes and whites in mind that I would like to express a few views of what happened in front of Amelia Courthouse (Virginia) on Saturday, August 13, 1966.

The Negro has for a long time been relegated to an inferior position. He has for centuries waded through a quagmire of despondency. The Civil Rights Act, which is nearly 100 years old, still has very tender roots indeed. The act was never enforced in the fullest sense until barely ten years ago. Negroes have realized that there is no better help than self-help. They have thrown their full weight into the struggle to liberate themselves from petty prejudices and discrimination, let alone economic and social inequalities that exist in the Great Society which is now spending millions of dollars on Poverty Programs.

The Freedom Rally was purposely organized in Amelia County by the NAACP to get Negroes to register because they know that the door to the exercise of enfranchisement has been opened to them. If they won't register, they cannot vote, and the choice will not be theirs. Someone they did not pick themselves will have to speak for them, and how could that work? Use of the grounds of the Courthouse was approved and sanctioned for use by the NAACP Branch of Amelia. At 10:45 a.m., the rally started with a prayer by The Rev. Craghead. The theme of his prayer was peace and harmony among all races here in the Great Society. God is up there but it is up to men, women and children of all races to do things that will bring about peace and harmony, which is more precious than anything I know.

Little did anyone think that the Klan would "invade" the rally and misbehave themselves. Certainly, I know that some whites still think Negroes have no right to be on equal terms with them. That is what the hate literature distributed by the Klan aim at. I was particularly surprised to see women engaged in a "lawless activity." Women for all that I know are "full of the milk of human kindness" and therefore should be the last to actively participate in or give support to any organization whose aim is quasi-violence. And yet some white women dressed in white or in their ordinary frocks were present on this shameful day.

What the Klan means by yelling "Never, Never, Never" can only be surmised. Possibly, it means that the Negro will never rise to the very same status as that of the whites, or that the Civil Rights Act will never come into function, or that Negroes should never be given the opportunity to organize themselves.

My Feeling of the Relationship Between the White and the Negro American in Amelia County, Va.

"Who will win the second World War?" "Oh, I bet the Americans will win the war" ..... This was the discussion of middle age and old farmers of the northern part of Thailand. While I was watching, they were discussing World War II between Japan and the U. S. Then the old man asked why America would win the war. The middle age farmer then answered precisely, "because God stays with them, they are a Christian country, what they are doing is right, and God will be on their side." Those words I heard from them still echo in my ear and from that time America has always been in my dream. To come to see America the Beautiful and God's Country.

Time passed and I graduated from the University with a bachelor degree in education. I met with friends who always asked whether I came to the U.S. because everybody wants to come here to continue a higher education and learn the ideas and way of life of American people. I heard of the programs in technology and education of America and most of all the idea of Democracy, Liberty, Equality and Opportunity of all people. We also heard of human rights and brotherhood. And finally America is more popular to the leadership of the free world in fighting Communism.

Average people understand what the U. S. is fighting for. The answer -- Justice, Liberty, Freedom and the Rights of people all over the world. I think that people of the world are watching you - every American citizen - as the model. If you behave yourselves as the good people they will appreciate you and if you do something wrong they will blame and anti you. So American people must be aware of themselves as the leadership of the free world. Every American has the responsibility to deserve this.

I know and realized when I came to study here that America has a big and severe problem as to every American's citizenship. You can't deny that you won't get involved. For me, I really sympathize with those Americans having limited rights and opportunities. American people consists of a great many nationalities. The majority are called white and black or Negro, but all of the races become one nation under one constitution as Americans. Yes, they are American citizens.

I don't like to hear the words, "you are black" and "you are white." I do not like to see here " Negro bus, Negro school, Negro community, white bus, white school and white church." I come here to call everyone "My American Friend."

I understood that many American people think that racial problems do not exist in America because the law and constitution has been established and reinforced.

As I have been working and and learning the Negro community and having discussions with the whites in Amelia Cty., sponsored by the Presbyterian Church, U.S.A., for two months; I realize that the problems occurred on both sides, but in different attitudes and forms. The Negroes in Amelia County are the poorest. Their average income is far below $3,000 per family. They have inferior education and job opportunities when compared to whites in the same county. Mostly, each family has more than four children. They want only to get a job and earn money for keeping the family. There is lack of stimulation and they don't have time to think of progress. When they get a job they try to deserve it. I have interviewed many middle age adults about better jobs. One man answered, "How can I get a better job when I finished only the 4th grade?" Their children drop out of school and have no job. The average teenager who graduates from high school leaves home to get a job or study in big cities. The majority of people who still live at home are children and unskilled parents.

As I observed the civil rights workers trying to help Negro people go to register and vote, I find mostly middle class Negroes registering to vote while there are a lot of low educated persons who do not register. They have the attitude that voting gives them no advantage. They are not enthusiastic to register. And the big problem is they do not trust civil rights workers who could help them. It is not their fault not to register and vote. They have gotten used to this kind of situation for many decades. They were prohibited from registering to vote by superstructure power. This is white power or Klan groups. Even the Klansmen are the minority but they have built up their power to make Negroes afraid of them.

Recently, the Klan has become more active in Amelia County. On August 13, 1966, they showed up in public at Amelia Courthouse at the Freedom Rally and disturbed the Negroes, and during the same month 20 Klan groups held their own rallies in Amelia County. KKK ideals depend on hate and fear of the uprising of the Negro. The jealousy and envy are fixed in their minds. The attitude and pride make humans hate and anti each other. I feel that both sides lack understanding and communication. The attitude of inferiority and superiority still exist among too many people. (Cont'd. Pg. 5)

So it seems that if we want to see the great change in the future among Negroes in Amelia, we will have to build up the attitudes and ideas of the Negro youngster.

Finally, do not forget the truth that in getting a job done, working with one side won't be successful, if we neglect the other side. We know white people are the majority of the country and they may cooperate or anti. However, the changing of attitudes of both sides is really significant. I think if white people would understand and want to help, the attitudes of the Negroes would change; but the majority of the whites do not want to get involved. They just want to stay outside and watch. However, everybody has the responsibility to do something to help their neighbors. I think people all over the world want to see American people become one nation under God, with Freedom, Liberty, Equality, Human Rights, Peace and Good Will existing all over the world.

Virginian Sees No Negroes on Police Force

VIRGINIA
AG 9/25/62

By MICHAEL DROSNIN
Washington Post News Service

WASHINGTON — Virginia's all-white state police can expect to remain all white, the troopers' personnel director declared in the wake of reports the force is 59 men short.

"We don't have any Negroes on the force now," said Capt. M. S. Urick in a telephone interview from Richmond, "and we don't expect to have any in the near future."

URICK'S statement followed reports of continuing shortages in the 847-man Virginia State Police force despite recent "intensive recruiting efforts." Urick made it clear that no special efforts would be made to attract Negroes to a force which has never broken the color bar.

"The fact is that the Negroes just don't meet our standards," he said. "There's no prejudice," he added. "It's just that the majority of the colored people have done miserably on our tests."

The tests on which the Negro applicants have fared so poorly, Urick said, are general intelligence examinations of the type given to high school seniors and college freshmen.

"I THINK it would be quite a good idea to get some Negroes on the force," Urick said, "but I'm not going to go out and employ colored people just to have some in our department."

The personnel supervisor denied that there has been any pressure to keep the state polic segregated. "I'm pretty sure there'd be people who'd be upset if we had Negro troopers," he said, "but I can assure you there's been no pressure."

Few Virginia Negroes have applied for state police jobs in recent years, according to Capt. Urick. He estimated there have not been more than 25 Negro applicants since 1960.

"I don't know why it is that so few of them want to be on our force," he said. "Maybe it's because one who could come up to our standards can command a better job with the situation as it is now."

The starting salary for a state trooper is $5,400 a year, with a maximum of $7,032 after five and one-half years on the force.

BYRD'S LEAD EBBS IN VIRGINIA DRIVE

VIRGINIA

He Is Still Expected to Win, but With a Narrow Edge

9/28/66

By BEN A. FRANKLIN

Special to The New York Times

RICHMOND, Sept. 27—Indications that Harry F. Byrd Jr. would handily win election to the remaining four years of his father's Senate term have taken a sudden and, to many Virginians, a shocking turn.

"It is almost unthinkable," a Byrd organization Democrat said today, "but young Harry is in serious trouble. He can't lose, but he is probably going to be humiliated by the closest shave of any Byrd in Virginia history."

Other observers here agree that a Byrd defeat seems unlikely, but there is mounting anxiety among conservatives here over both the short and long-range implications of recent developments.

Foremost among them is the younger Mr. Byrd's decision to withdraw from campaigning until the last two or three weeks before Nov. 8.

Young Harry, as he is still respectfully known at the age of 51, is the heir and appointed successor of former Senator Harry Flood Byrd, 79, for many years chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

Elder Byrd Still in Coma

The elder Mr. Byrd, still in a terminal coma caused by a malignant brain tumor, resigned from the Senate when his health failed last November. His son was appointed to the vacancy and now faces his first statewide election in a bid to fill the remaining four years of the term.

It is a situation that has encouraged charges of "dynastic succession" from both Republicans and liberal Democrats. The Byrd organization's apparent move away from ultra-conservative positions has also brought militant opposition from Virginia's segregationist Conservative party, which regards Mr. Byrd as "too liberal."

The growing strength of Negro voters is another complication. As a state Senator, the younger Mr. Byrd bitterly opposed school desegregation. About 200,000 Negro voters are registered, and as a Democratic official put it, "they wouldn't vote for Harry now if he married one of them."

Mr. Byrd's Republican opponent, Lawrence M. Traylor of Heathsville, is waging a surprisingly brisk and irreverent campaign, labeling the bearer of Virginia's best-known name "Lyndon Bird's junior Byrd."

And the theme of John W. Carter of Danville, the Conservative candidate—that Mr. Byrd has failed to expose "Communist agitators among Negroes" and is almost as liberal as President Johnson—is reported to have found some support in Virginia's strongly segregationist tobacco areas.

Some of Mr. Byrd's supporters are concerned about a third opponent, J. B. Brayman, a Lynchburg lunchroom counterman running as an anti-Byrd independent. Mr. Brayman polled about 30,000 votes, many of them cast by Negroes, in 1964 as an independent running against the elder Mr. Byrd.

Moreover, Mr. Byrd now faces the threat of defections in urban centers among moderate, anti-organization Democrats. They have complained publicly that, to retain his hold on conservative voters, Mr. Byrd has shunned Democratic Congressional candidates with progressive leanings.

Associated Press

HIS VICTORY IN DOUBT: Senator Harry F. Byrd Jr., Virginia Democrat, who is seeking election to remaining four years of Senate seat held by his father.

Focus of Dispute

The focus of this dispute is in the Eighth Congressional District, just south of Washington. Representative Howard W. Smith, 83, was narrowly denied renomination there in a major primary upset by a young and liberal anti-organization legislator, George C. Rawlings Jr. of Fredericksburg.

Mr. Byrd has avoided an endorsement of Mr. Rawlings, and many of his and Mr. Smith's supporters are working openly for Mr. Rawlings' Republican opponent, William L. Scott of Fairfax.

Against this array of difficulties, Mr. Byrd chose the opening yesterday of a Democratic senatorial headquarters here to announce that he would abandon all campaigning until Congress adjourned.

In effect, this postponed the start of his campaign until Oct. 15, at the earliest.

It would leave Mr. Byrd only three weeks, at best, to deal with the mounting political uncertainties in his own state, and the decision has angered some of his own supporters here, particularly the loyal conservatives.

A joint senatorial campaign is to be carried on alone by William B. Spong, an anti-organization former state Senator from Portsmouth. Mr. Spong, 45, is Mr. Byrd's running mate by virtue of his victory in the primary over Senator A. Willis Robertson, 79, who for long has been an organization stalwart.

Although Mr. Spong, a moderate, probably is acceptable to many conservative Byrd loyalists, Mr. Byrd's assignment of campaign responsibilities to him is expected to cost the Senator some conservative support.

Turmoil in Virginia's Politics May Bring Upset of Democrats

VIRGINIA By B. D. AYRES 11/6/66

Special to The New York Times

RICHMOND, Nov. 5—There is more turmoil in Virginia politics this fall than at any time since the mid-1920's when the late Senator Harry F. Byrd began building the formidable Democratic machine that was to bear his name.

The last 12 months have seen serious disruptions in the once-staid and ultra-conservative political order of things in the old dominion. In the confusion several political upsets could occur this Tuesday.

However, Republicans are not expected to grab control of this predominantly Democratic state regardless of the results of the various contests. Rather the elections are more likely to clarify or confuse further the future course of the Democratic party in Virginia.

The campaign oratory has been somewhat standard. Republicans have hammered away at the issue of inflation and the "evils" of the Johnson Administration.

Democrats have tried to avoid too many ties to the Administration. The Conservative party, a growing splinter group that espouses segregation, has preached states' rights. And just about everybody has called for an honorable peace in Vietnam.

The most talked-about race involves the late Senator Byrd's 51-year-old son, Harry F. Byrd Jr., who has held a temporary Senate appointment since his father resigned a year ago because of ill health.

Mr. Byrd hopes Virginia voters will send him back to Capitol Hill on his own merit for the remaining four years of the six-year term.

His three opponents are Lawrence M. Traylor, a 38-year-old Republican moderate and lawyer from Heathsville; J. B. Brayman, 65, a sometime short-order cook and ofttime independent political candidate from Lynchburg; and John W. Carter, 45, a Danville lawyer and founder of the Conservative arty.

In a primary contest last July the younger Mr. Byrd, "Little Harry" to many, echoed his father's famed conservation but was unable to reproduce "Big Harry's" special brand of political charisma.

The result was a close race in which Mr Byrd just squeaked past a liberal anti-machine lawyer from Alexandria, former State Senator Arimstead L. Boothe.

Mr. Boothe drew strong support from the Old Dominion's growing Negro vote and from Democrats who had grown increasingly resentful of what was termed "the Byrd dynasty.'

Most political observers here believe Mr. Byrd will win on Tuesday. But the possibility of an upset remains if Mr. Traylor successfully binds together an anti-Byrd coalition somewhat like that Mr. Boothe built, and if there are heavy defections to the Conservative party. The Brayman vote is not expected to be significant.

The Democratic candidate for the other United States Senate seat, State Senator William B. Spong, has been waging a hard campaign.

Mr. Spong, 46, is a Portsmouth moderate and lawyer who last summer thoroughly disturbed old-line Democrats in the state with a narrow primary victory over Senator A. Willis Robertson, a veteran of 33 years on Capitol Hill. The Senator was beaten by a coalition similar to that employed by Mr. Boothe and Mr. Byrd Jr.

Mr. Spong is expected to win handily over his Conservative party opponent, F. Lee Hawthorne, and the Republican candidate, James P. Ould Jr.

Virginia has 10 Congressional seats, but only seven are being contested this fall. Three of the elections—in the Eighth, Ninth and 10th Districts—are considered close.

In the Eighth, which stretches from the mouth of the Potomac River almost to Washington, William L. Scott, a 50-year-old Republican conservative and Fairfax lawyer, is running strongly against state delegate George C. Rawlings, the 44-year-old moderate Democrat from Fredericksburg who beat Representative Howard W. Smith last summer in a primary upset.

In the 10th District, which includes many of the Virginia suburbs next to Washington, Representative Joel T. Broyhill, a 47-year-old Republican, is running for an eighth term against state delegate Clide L. DuVal, a 54-year-old Democrat who has included a trip to Vietnam in his campaigning.

In the Ninth District in the western tip of the state, Representative W. Pat Jennings, a 47-year-old moderate Democrat, is seeking a seventh term against the well-financed challenge of former Representative William C. Wampler, a 40-year-

RICHMOND, Nov. 9—Virgini voters answered some old political questions yesterday but they also raised some new ones.

Though Republicans won two key Congressional races and now hold four of the 10 Virginia seats in the House, the future course of the party in the Old Dominion was almost as much in doubt today as ever.

The party, while not financially destitute, does not have the monetary resources available to the Democrats, who have controlled the state for almost a century.

Nor are Virginia Republicans as well organized as their Democratic opponents, whose lines of communication filter down through an elaborate pyramid of patronage and appointive offices to city precincts and county courthouses.

Despite the four House seats now held by the Virginia Republicans, only a scattering of the state's 96 counties are controlled by Republicans. Republicans hold only three seats in the 40-seat State Senate and only 11 seats in the 100-seat Houe of Delegates.

In Republican Hands

The Congressional districts now in Republican hands are the Sixth, Eighth, Ninth and 10th.

Republican control is nothing new in the Sixth, which includes the rolling Roanoke area in the central part of the state. There, Representative Richard H. Poff, a conservative, has been in office since 1952.

Nor is Republican control unusual in the 10th, which includes the urban areas just across the Potomac River from Washington. There, Representative Joel T. Broyhill, also a conservative, has just won his eighth consecutive term.

However, when Republicans grabbed control of the Eighth and Ninth Districts, Democrats paused for a thought or two.

For the last 33 years, the Eighth, which runs from the mouth of the Potomac almost to Washington, has been represented by a stanchly conservative Democrat, Howard W. Smith.

For the last 12 years, the Ninth, which includes the extreme western tip of the state, has been represented by W. Pat Jennings, a moderate-to-liberal Democrat with strong ties to the Johnson Administration.

Last July in the Eighth District's Democratic primary, Representative Smith was narrowly upset by a hard-working moderate, State Delegate George C. Rawlings Jr. of Fredericksburg.

Bu the Rawlings victory so infuriated old line conservative Democrats in the Eighth, who had been somewhat apathetic to that point, that in yesterday's election they voted by the thousands for the Republican candidate, William L. Scott of Fairfax, a moderate-conservative. Mr. Scott won handily.

I nthe Ninth District, Representative Jennings was beaten by a nold political foe, William C. aWmpler, a moderate who ran an extremely well-financed campaign that was marked by slashing attacks on the Johnson Administration.

The other key races involved contests for Virginia's two Senate seats.

The Republican candidates, James P. Ould Jr. of Lynchburg and Lawrence M. Taylor of Heathsville, ran relatively poor races in losing to their Democratic opponents, State Senator William B. Spong of Pourthsmouh and Harry F. Byrd Jr., son of the late Senator.

KLAN RESURGENCY AROUSES VIRGINIA

VIRGINIA

Governor's Threat a Result of Many Cross-Burnings

NYT 12/11/66

Special to The New York Times

RICHMOND, Dec. 10 — An 18-month-old resurgency in Ku Klux Klan activity in Virginia is the factor that prompted the state's Governor this week to denounce the klan "for its record of bigotry."

Gov. Mills E. Godwin Jr. coupled the vigorous denunciation with notice that he was posting a $1,000 state reward from his discretionary funds for information leading to the arrest and conviction of any person illegally burning a cross in Virginia.

He noted that it was a felony, with provisions for a penitentiary sentence, to burn a cross without permission on either public or private property in Virginia.

His reward offer and castigation of the Klan came in the wake of a series of cross-burnings in recent weeks, particularly in the Richmond area.

Burning Follows Offer

There have been at least nine such burnings in Richmond. Ironically, the latest burning took place within an hour after Governor Godwin announced the reward offer Wednesday night at the annual Brotherhood Citation Dinner of the Richmond chapter, National Conference of Christians and Jews.

The burning site was at the home of a high school student who had written sympathetically to a Richmond city councilman who had recently been subjected to telephone harassment. The councilman attributed the harassment to the Klan, which he had castigated publicly.

Governor Godwin, in a speech that drew loud applause at the Wednesday dinner meeting, said that Virginia had strong religious traditions.

But "men of faith," he said, "know that throughout history the crimes committed in liberty's name have been exceeded only by those committed in God's name.

"In our own time, and in our own state," he continued, "the most reprehensible of these is the desecration of the most sacred Christian symbol, the burning of a cross."

He said the burning cross was an old device long associated "with the record of bigotry compiled by the Ku Klux Klan."

"Throughout its history in the South, the flaming cross has been a symbol of terror," he continued. "Insofar as it is humanly possible to do so, its use must be stamped out."

Governor Godwin added that in order to focus law enforcement "on this detestable act," he would soon call a conference with the state's Attorney General, the Virginia State Police and local law enforcement officials.

The Klan — principally the United Klans of America—began a concerted push for Virginia members in the summer of 1965.

Although membership figures are not announced, the Klan has made what is conceded to be considerable progress in Southern Virginia, stronghold of conservatism in the state, and in the Richmond area.

Most knowledgeable sources say Klan membership in Virginia is about 2,000. They supplement that estimate by saying that 8,000 to 10,000 other Virginians are in close sympathy with Klan activities—many of them attending the multiple rallies the Klan has conducted in the state and some contributing financially to the Klan.

Unofficial counts during the last 18 months show up to 175 Klan rallies in Virginia. The Klan has purchased a 50-by-80-foot tent capable of holding 500 to 600 persons and says it plans to hold a series of winter rallies in the state.

State SNCC Head Asks U.S. to Send Voting Observers

Rev. Benjamin S. Grinage, director of the Arkansas Project of the Student Nonviolent Co-ordinating Committee, has appealed to the United States Commission on Civil Rights to send a "substantial number" of observers to East Arkansas polling places in the elections coming up this year.

Failure of the Commission to do so could result in violence, Mr. Grinage contended. "Time is running out," he wrote the Commission chairman, John A. Hannah. "We hope that the Commission will not hesitate to use its powers to help minimize the dangers that lie ahead."

Mr. Grinage has been instrumental in numerous integration activities, including the sit-ins at the cafeteria in the basement of the state Capitol, which led to its being desegregated. He said in his letter election practices that he claimed were irregular had kept Negroes from voting or had nullified their ballots when they did vote and that if this were permitted to continue, "the Negro community will ultimately turn to violence."

In a "special report" accompanying the request and covering what it alleged were irregularities in four East Arkansas cities where Negro candidates for school boards were defeated in September, Mr. Grinage said many Arkansas Negroes until now have maintained their faith that the ballot box was the way to secure social justice.

"The continued denial of effective suffrage can be expected to erode that faith," the report said. "And with disillusionment with the political process will come the heightened sense of alienation from American society that prevails in the ghettos of the North

Rev. Benjamin S. Grinage, director of the Arkansas Project of the Student Nonviolent Co-ordinating Committee, has appealed to the United States Commission on Civil Rights to send a "substantial number" of observers to East Arkansas polling places in the elections coming up this year.

Mr. Grinage has been instrumental in numerous integration activities, including the sit-ins at the cafeteria in the basement of the state Capitol, which led to its being desegregated. He said in his letter election practices that he claimed were irregular had kept Negroes from voting or had nullified their ballots when they did vote and that if this were permitted to continue, "the Negro community will ultimately turn to violence."

In a "special report" accompanying the request and covering what it alleged were irregularities in four East Arkansas cities where Negro candidates for school boards were defeated in September, Mr. Grinage said many Arkansas Negroes until now have maintained their faith that the ballot box was the way to secure social justice.

"The continued denial of effective suffrage can be expected to erode that faith," the report said. "And with disillusionment with the political process will come the heightened sense of alienation from American society that prevails in the ghettos of the North. There can be no assurance that, in such circumstances, the cities of Arkansas will be immune to eruptions of violence such as have stunned the cities of the North."

He asked Hannah, "If the demand for political representation cannot find a legitimate channel, shall we be surprised when it finds its outlet on the streets.?"

He charged that because of what he called irregularities Arkansas Negroes will "remain effectively disfranchised" in this summer's primaries and the general election in the fall.

'Arkansas Way' Is Wrong He Says

While conceding that Negroes have "long been permitted to vote in Arkansas," Mr. Grinage said the "Arkansas way" of maintaining white political supremacy was through election practices, including destruction of Negro ballots, the mistabulation of votes for Negro candidates, illegal voting of the ballots of illiterates by election officials, probable multiple white voting, segregation at the polling places including ballot boxes, and denial of access to Negro poll watchers. Nor, Mr. Grinage said, is the Arkansas numbered ballot a secret one.

He said that the problem "soon will be the problem all across the South" as Negroes, who in many areas make up the majority of the population, become registered voters under provisions of the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

The presence of federal election observers would inhibit some of the alleged practices merely by their presence, Mr. Grinage said, but would not stop them altoghether. A Commission study on voting irregularities, however, would have a "favorable effect on federal enforcement policy," clarify some of the legal questions involved, study the integrity of those who are making the charges and draw attention to the existence of the problem, he said.

Katzenbach Scores Negro Suppression

AJ 2/28/66 VOTING

By WILLIAM B. WILLIAMS

U.S. Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenbach said here Monday that anyone trying to "frighten or coerce Negro citizens" to keep them from voting "will have the federal government to reckon with."

The attorney general made this remark in a prepared speech during a luncheon meeting sponsored by the Southern Regional Council which currently is promoting Negro voting drives.

On hand was a bevy of civil rights leaders and Georgia political figures. Included in the guest list were National Association for the Advancement of Colored People Director Roy Wilkins and Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Mayor Allen was also scheduled to attend.

In a prepared speech, Mr. Katzenbach said, "I have a message for those who may think of trying to frighten or coerce Negro citizens — or any citizens—from trying to register or vote.

"If you do, you will have the federal government to reckon with.

"THE STILL MORE effective antidote to intimidation, however, flows directly from energetic registration efforts and that is numbers. Two men or twenty men can be threatened, fired or harassed; but not a thousand.

"Not only is it impossible to intimidate large numbers, but large-scale exercise of the vote changes the attitudes that might otherwise breed imtimidation," he said.

Mr. Katzenbach said "substantial gains" have been made in registration of Negroes throughout the South. In states affected by the Voting Rights Act, Negro voter registration increased from 588,000 to more than 900,000, he said.

But in spite of the gains, more than half of the adult Negroes in the South "are not participating" in voting.

"None of us can be satisfied until they do," he said.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL congratulated the Southern Regional Council for undertaking its most recent voter education project.

He indicated that getting out the vote may be difficult because many persons aided by the council are inexperienced in voting.

"The day of equality will not come merely when Negroes can and do vote freely . . . nor when they elect Negro candidates just because they are Negro. There would be little majesty in an equality that is so superficial," he said.

"We are . . . arriving at the time when the civil rights movement can and should turn from protest to affirmation, from a force against discrimination to a major affirmative force . . . of all the South," he said.

HE SAID that under the Voting Rights Act local officials, had by Feb. 1 registered 17,000 Negroes in Georgia, 56,000 in Alabama, 53,000 in Louisiana, 51,000 in Mississippi and 24,000 in South Carolina.

"But there are still other areas where the response has been grudging, token compliance, areas where even public officials have put maintaining the old ways above maintaining the law.

"The responsibility of the federal government under the act is to insure full compliance with the right to vote," he said.

He said that if necessary more federal examiners would be sent to the South to insure full compliance with the law.

U.S. Judges Kill Alabama's Poll Tax

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — A three-judge federal panel struck down Alabama's $1.50-per-year poll tax Thursday in a split decision with the majority calling the tax "one of the last great pillars of racial discrimination."

The decision is effective immediately and will apply to the state's May 3 Democratic primary and all subsequent state elections.

U.S. Circuit Judge Richard T. Rives and U.S. Dist. Judge Frank M. Johnson Jr., both of Montgomery, said in the majority opinion:

"We hold that from its inception the Alabama poll tax was illegal and invalid as an attempt to subvert the Fifteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. The necessary effect of the poll tax as adopted in 1901 was to disenfranchise Negro voters. The history of the poll tax leaves no doubt that this was its sole purpose. Such clear and intentional attempts to deny or abridge the right to vote necessarily runs afoul of the Fifteenth Amendment."

U.S. Circuit Judge Walter P. Gewin of Tuscaloosa dissented, saying, "the poll tax has never been declared invalid by the Suprme Court."

Gewin said similar arguments were presented to the Suprme Court in a Virginia case which is pending and "the principle of judicial restraint dictates that we await the action of the Supreme Court."

However, Gewin said he would readily join in a decree "removing and prohibiting every vestige of racial discriminatory or other unconstitutional application" of the tax.

It's Time to Let Votes Talk On Rights, Katzenbach Says

By REMER TYSON

U.S. Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach said Monday in Atlanta the time is arriving when the civil rights movement "should turn from protest to affirmation."

Katzenbach told a Southwide meeting of the Southern Regional Council, "A year ago, our attention was fastened on what was, in some areas, perhaps the only type of democratic expression possible for Negroes—demonstrations in the streets.

"Today, we join to devote still broader concern to the scope and speed with which Negroes can now exercise the basic form of democratic expression — the vote."

BALLOT IS TEST

Nicholas Katzenbach

The attorney general, who was the principle speaker at a luncheon to kick off a Southern Regional Council voter education project to register two million Negroes, said the time is approaching for civil rights groups to change from "a force against discrimination to a major affirmative force in the life not only of the Negroes of the South but of all the South."

Some of the leaders of the civil rights movement, on hand to hear Katzenbach's speech, said immediately afterwards that demonstrations may be necessary to force the attorney general to send more federal voting examiners into the South —especially Georgia.

Dr. Martin Luther King, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, said, "There has been too much caution in sending out registrars. In some cases, I think we will have to demonstrate."

John Lewis, chairman of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, said, "There needs to be some (federal examiners) in this state—in southwest Georgia, particularly Baker County."

Georgia is the only one of five Deep South states which have been watched closely by the Justice department since enactment of the Voting Rights Act last August that does not have federal examiners.

New registration has been much slower in Georgia than in Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina where federal examiners have been designated for 36 counties by the attorney general.

Katzenbach said that since enactment of the Voting Rights Act that federal examiners have registered 100,000 Negroes and local officials have registered another 200,000 in the five Deep South states. Georgia has registered only 17,000 new voters since last August.

More than 900,000 Negroes — nearly 40 per cent of those eligible—are registered to vote in the five Deep South states, said Katzenbach.

"I hope and expect that by the time of the next election in each of these states, more than half of the voting age Negro population will register — and will vote," he said.

The attorney general said "neither local compliance nor federal examiners" make the crucial difference in Negro registration.

"The most important generating factor is local organization," he said. "The counties which have seen extensive Negro registration are those where campaigns have been conducted."

Katzenbach said the real test of efforts to give Negroes a fuller voice in Southern affairs will come on election day.

"Unless it is to be a hollow exercise, it must be followed by voting," he declared.

Later, in remarks to an audience at the Universalist Unitarian Church, the attorney general said that while civil rights progress has been rapid, it hasn't been "fast enough to really satisfy or suit me." He said his dream is that "we stop using so much of our energies on what are really tired old problems," such as Negro rights.

Voter Act Legal, High Court Holds

AC 3/8/66

By BARY SCHWEID

WASHINGTON (AP)—The Supreme Court hs declared constitutional key sections of the 1965 Voting Rights law.

Congress has the power under the 15th Amendment to suspend literary tests and to order federal registrars into the Deep South "to banish the blight of racial discrimination," Chief Justice Earl Warren said Monday for the high court.

"Hopefully," he said, "millions of nonwhite Americans will now be able to participate for the first time on an equal basis in the government under which they live."

Warren's face was expressionless as he read the decision. When he was done, Justice Hugo L. Black, his eyes darting back and forth across the less than half-filled courtroom, announced that with regret he felt compelled to dissent in part.

A provision which Black said should have been declared invalid bars states covered by the law from adding voting amendments to their constitutions or passing new voting laws without review by federal authorities.

"Nothing like that was ever contemplated when the Constitution or the 15th Amendment was adopted," Black said.

In his written opinion, the 80-year-old justice added that this treats states as if they were "little more than conquered provinces."

Otherwise, the decision was unanimous and Black voted with the eight other justices.

The court upheld the voting law four short months after the tribunal granted South Carolina permission to file suit with it instead of waging its attack up the judicial ladder.

Five other Southern states—Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and Virginia—supported South Carolina's argument that the law unconstitutionally and arbitrarily punishes them. They and North Carolina are its prime targets.

Twenty other states joined Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenbach in defending the law as a constitutional exercise of Congress' power to enforce Americans' right to vote.

Atty. Gen. Jack Gremillion of Louisiana said in Baton Rouge, of the decision: It "means that the federal judiciary and the federal government have taken over the field of state registration of voters. This is really another step in the total destruction of the rights of states to regulate their internal affairs. It also undoubtedly leads to universal suffrage."

In Atlanta, Georgia's Atty. Gen. Arthur K. Bolton said: "The people of Georgia will go on obeying the law just as they have been."

In its last sitting until March 21, the justices also:

—Reversed two lower federal courts and cleared the way for Dora Surowitz, a Brooklyn seamstress, to sue officers and directors of Hilton Hotels Corp. on a claim they sold their private stockholdings to the company at an artificially inflated price.

—Ruled that a Chicago man, Theodore Robinson, convicted of slaying his girl friend, should have been given a sanity hearing. Justice Tom C. Clark said in a 7-2 decision that if Illinois does not try Robinson again with a "concurrent" sanity hearing he can go free.

—Refused to hear an appeal by embattled U.S. Dist. Judge Stephen S. Chandler of Oklahoma City from an order disqualifying him from trying a case involving Texaco, Inc. The court ruling is a part from a pending appeal by Chandler involving his authority to hear new cases.

Excerpts From Court's Opinion Upholding Key Provisions of Voting Rights Act

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 7—Following are excerpts from the Supreme Court's opinion upholding key provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and from Justice Hugo L. Black's dissent on one aspect of the case:

Court's Opinion

Chief Justice Warren delivered the opinion of the Court.

By leave of the Court, South Carolina has filed a bill of complaint, seeking a declaration that selected provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 violate the Federal Constitution, and asking for an injunction against enforcement of these provisions by the Attorney General. Original jurisdiction is founded on the presence of a controversy between a state and a citizen of another state under Art. III, Section 2, of the Constitution. Because no issues of fact were raised in the complaint, and because of South Carolina's desire to obtain a ruling prior to its primary elections in June, 1966, we dispensed with appointment of a trial master and expedited our hearing of the case.

Recognizing that the questions presented were of urgent concern to the entire country, we invited all of the states to participate in this proceeding as friends of the court. A majority responded by submitting or joining in briefs on the merits, some supporting South Carolina and others the Attorney General. Seven of these states also requested and received permission to argue the case orally at our hearing. Without exception, despite the emotional overtones of the proceeding, the briefs and oral arguments were temperate, lawyer-like and constructive. All viewpoints on the issues have been fully developed, and this additional assistance has been most helpful to the Court.

New Remedies Cited

The Voting Rights Act was designed by Congress to banish the blight of racial discrimination in voting, which has infected the electoral process in parts of our country for nearly a century. The act creates stringest new remedies for voting discrimination where it persists on a pervasive scale, and in addition the statute strengthens existing remedies for pockets of voting discrimination elsewhere in the country. Congress assumed the power to prescribe these remedies from Section 2 of the 15th Amendment, which authorizes the national legislature to effectuate by "appropriate" measures the constitutional prohibition against racial discrimination all the tests, without any outside assistance and without the slightest error. The good morals requirement is so vague and subjective that it has constituted an open invitation to abuse at the hands of voting officials. Negroes obliged to obtain vouchers from registered voters have found it virtually impossible to comply in areas where almost no Negroes are on the rolls.

Previous Laws Recalled

In recent years, Congress has repeatedly tried to cope with the problem of facilitating case-by-case litigation against voting discrimination. The Civil Rights Act of 1957 authorized the Attorney General to seek injunctions against public and private interference with the right to vote on racial grounds. Perfecting amendments in the Civil Rights Act of 1960 permitted the joinder of states as party defendants, gave the Attorney General access to local voting records, and authorized courts to register voters in areas of systematic discrimination.

Title I of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 expedited the hearing of voting cases before three-judge courts and outlawed some of the tactics used to disqualify Negroes from voting in Federal elections.

The previous legislation has proved ineffective for a number of reasons. Voting suits are unusually onerous to prepare, sometimes requiring as many as 6,000 man-hours spent combing through registration records in preparation for trial. Litigation has been exceedingly slow, in part because of the ample opportunities for delay afforded voting officials and others involved in the proto the states by the Constitution.

Has Congress exercised its powers under the 15th Amendment in an appropriate manner with relations to the states?

The ground rules for resolving this question are clear. The language and purpose of the 15th Amendment, the prior decisions construing its several provisions, and the general doctrines of constitutional interpretation, all point to one fundamental principle. As against the reserved powers of the states, Congress may use any rational means to effectuate the constitutional prohibition of racial discrimination in voting.

We therefore reject South Carolina's argument that Congress may appropriately do no more than to forbid violations of the 15th Amendment in general terms—that the task of fashioning specific remedies or of applying them to particular localities must necessarily be left entirely to the courts. Congress is not circumscribed by any such artificial rules under Section 2 of the 15th Amendment. In the oft-repeated words of Chief Justice Marshall, referring to another specific legislative authorization in the Constitution, "this power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than prescribed in the Constitution."

[4]

Congress exercised its authority under the 15th Amendment in an inventive manner when it enacted the Voting Rights Act of 1965. First: The measure prescribes remedies for voting discrimination which go into effect without any need for prior adjudication. This was clearly a legitimate response to the problem, for which there is ample precedent under other constitutional provisions.

Second: The Act intentionally confines these remedies to a small number of states and political subdivisions which in most instances were familiar to Congress by name. This, too, was a permissible method of dealing the problem. Congress had learned that substantial voting discrimination presently occurs in certain sections of the country, and it knew no way of accurately forecasting whether the evil might spread elsewhere in the future.

In acceptable legislative fashion, Congress chose to limit its attention to the geographic areas where immediate action seemed necessary. The doctrine of the equality of states, invoked by South Carolina, does not bar this approach, for that doctrine applies only to the materialized during the preceding five years. Despite South Carolina's argument to the contrary, Congress might appropriately limit litigation under this provision to a single court in the District of Columbia, pursuant to its constitutional power under Art. III, Sec. 1, to "ordain and establish" inferior Federal tribunals.

South Carolina contends that these termination procedures are a nullity because they impose an impossible burden of proof upon states and political subdivision entitled to relief. As the Attorney General pointed out during hearings on the act, however, an area need do no more than to submit affidavits from voting officials, asserting that they have not been guilty of racial discrimination through the use of tests and devices during the past five years, and then to refute whatever evidence to the contrary may be adduced by the Federal Government.

Suspension of Tests

We now arrive at consideration of the specific remedies prescribed by the Act for areas included within the coverage formula. South pointment of Federal Examiners to list qualified applicants who are thereafter entitled to vote, subject to an expeditious challenge procedure. This was clearly an appropriate response to the problem, closely related to remedies authorized in prior cases.

After enduring nearly a century of widespread resistance to the 15th Amendment, Congress has marshalled an array of potent weapons against the evil, with authority in the Attorney General to employ them effectively. Many of the areas directly affected by this development have indicated their willingness to abide by any restraints legitimately imposed upon them.

We here hold that the portions of the Voting Rights Act properly before us are a valid means for carrying out the commands of the 15th Amendment. Hopefully, millions of nonwhite Americans will now be able to participate for the first time on an equal basis in the Government under which they live.

We may finally look forward to the day when truly "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall judicial forum for settling these important questions of this Court acting under its original Art. III, Section 2, jurisdiction to try cases in which a state is a party. At least a trial in this Court would treat the states with the dignity to which they should be entitled as constituent members of our Federal union.

A Basic Conflict

(B) My second and more basic objection to Section 5 is that Congress has here exercised its power under Section 2 of the 15th Amendment through the adoption of means that conflict with the most basic principles of the Constitution.

As the Court says, the limitations of the power granted under Section 2 are the same as the limitations imposed on the exercise of any of the powers expressly granted Congress by the Constitution.

Section 5, by providing that some of the states cannot pass state laws or adopt state constitutional amendments without first being compelled to beg Federal authorities to approve their policies, so distorts our constitutional structure of government as to render any distinction drawn in the Constitution betwen state and Federal power almost meaningless.

One of the most basic premises upon which our structure of government was founded that the Federal Government was to have certain specific and limited powers and no others, and all other power was to be reserved either "to the states respectively, or to the people."

Certainly if all the provisions of our Constitution which limit the power of the Federal Government and reserve other power to the states are to mean anything, they mean at least that the states have power to pass laws and amend their constitutions without first sending their officials hundreds of miles away to beg Federal authorities to approve them.

Moreover, it seems to me that Section 5 which gives Federal officials power to veto state laws they do not like is in direct conflict with the clear command of our Constitution that "the United States shall guarantee to every state in this union a republican form of government."

I cannot hel pbut believe that the inevitable effect of any such law which forces any one of the states to entreat Federal authorities in far-away places for approval of local laws before they can become effective is to create the impression that the state or states treated in this way are little more than conquered provinces."

eral. Seven of these States also requested and received permission to argue the case orally at our hearing. Without exception, despite the emotional overtones of the proceeding, the briefs and oral arguments were temperate, lawyer-like and constructive. All viewpoints on the issues have been fully developed, and this additional assistance has been most helpful to the Court.

New Remedies Cited

The Voting Rights Act was designed by Congress to banish the blight of racial discrimination in voting, which has infected the electoral process in parts of our country for nearly a century. The act creates stringest new remedies for voting discrimination where it persists on a pervasive scale, and in addition the statute strengthens existing remedies for pockets of voting discrimination elsewhere in the country. Congress assumed the power to prescribe these remedies from Section 2 of the 15th Amendment, which authorizes the national legislature to effectuate by "appropriate" measures the constitutional prohibition against racial discrimination in voting.

We hold that the sections of the act which are properly before us are an appropriate means for carrying out Congress's constitutional responsibilities and are consonant with all other provisions of the Constitution. We therefore deny South Carolina's request that enforcement of these sections of the act be enjoined.

The constitutional propriety of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 must be judged with reference to the historical experience which it reflects. Before enacting the measure, Congress explored with great care the problem of racial discrimination in voting. The House and Senate Committees on the Judiciary each held hearings for nine days and received testimony from a total of 67 witnesses. More than three full days were consumed discussing the bill on the floor of the House, while the debate in the Senate covered 26 days in all.

At the close of these deliberations, the verdict of both chambers was overwhelming. The House approved the act by a vote of 328-74, and the measure passed the Senate by a margin of 79-18.

Two points emerge vividly from the voluminous legislative history of the act contained in the committee hearings and floor debates.

First: Congress felt itself confronted by an insidious and pervasive evil which had been perpetuated in certain parts of our country through unremitting and ingenious defiance of the Constitution.

Second: Congress concluded that the unsuccessful remedies which it had prescribed in the past would have to be replaced by sterner and more elaborate measures in order to satisfy the clear commands of the 15th Amendment.

Voting Tests Noted

According to the results of recent Justice Department voting suits, [discriminatory application of voting tests] is now the principal method used to bar Negroes from the polls. Discriminatory administration of voting qualifications has been found in all eight Alabama cases, in all nine Louisiana cases, and in all nine Mississippi cases which have gone to final judgment. Moreover, in almost all of these cases, the courts have held that the discrimination was pursuant to a widespread "pattern or practice."

White applicants for registration have often been excused altogether from the literacy and understanding tests or have been given easy versions, have received extensive help from voting officials, and have been registered despite serious errors in their answers.

Negroes, on the other hand, have typically been required to pass difficult versions of against voting discrimination. The Civil Rights Act of 1957 authorized the Attorney General to seek injunctions against public and private interference with the right to vote on racial grounds. Perfecting amendments in the Civil Rights Act of 1960 permitted the joinder of states as party defendants, gave the Attorney General access to local voting records, and authorized courts to register voters in areas of systematic discrimination.

Title I of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 expedited the hearing of voting cases before three-judge courts and outlawed some of the tactics used to disqualify Negroes from voting in Federal elections.

The previous legislation has proved ineffective for a number of reasons. Voting suits are unusually onerous to prepare, sometimes requiring as many as 6,000 man-hours spent combing through registration records in preparation for trial. Litigation has been exceedingly slow, in part because of the ample opportunities for delay afforded voting officials and others involved in the proceedings.

Even when favorable decisions have finally been obtained, some of the states affected have merely switched to discriminatory devices not covered by the Federal decrees or have enacted difficult new tests designed to prolong the existing disparity between white and Negro registration. Alternatively, certain local officials have defied and evaded court orders or have simply closed their registration offices to freeze the voting rolls. The provision of the 1960 law authorizing registration by Federal officers has held little impact on local maladministration because of its procedural complexities.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 reflects Congress's firm intention to rid the country of racial discrimination in voting. The heart of the Act is a complex scheme of stringent remedies aimed at areas where voting discrimination has been most flagrant.

Section 4 (a)-(d) lays down a formula defining the states and political subdivisions to which these new remedies apply. The first of the remedies, contained in Section 4 (a), is the suspension of literacy tests and similar voting qualifications for a period of five years from the last occurrence of substantial voting discrimination.

Section 5 prescribes a second remedy, the suspension of all new voting regulations pending review by Federal authorities to determine whether their use would perpetuate voting discrimination.

The third remedy, covered in Sections 6 (b), 7, 9, and 13 (a), is the assignment of Federal examiners by the Attorney General to list qualified applicants who are thereafter entitled to vote in all elections.

Other Areas Affected

Other provisions of the act prescribe subsidiary cures for persistent voting discrimination. Section 8 authorizes the appointment of Federal poll-watchers in places to which Federal examiners have already been assigned.

Section 10(d) excuses those made eligible to vote in sections of the country covered by Section 4(b) of the Act from paying accumulated past poll taxes for state and local elections.

Section 12(e) provides for balloting by persons denied access to the polls in areas where Federal examiners have been appointed.

The remaining remedial portions of the Act are aimed at voting discrimination in any area of the country where it may occur.

[3]

These provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 are challenged on the fundamental ground that they exceed the powers of Congress and encroach on an area reserved manner when it enacted the Voting Rights Act of 1965. First: The measure prescribes remedies for voting discrimination which go into effect without any need for prior adjudication. This was clearly a legitimate response to the problem, for which there is ample precedent under other constitutional provisions.

Second: The Act intentionally confines these remedies to a small number of states and political subdivisions which in most instances were familiar to Congress by name. This, too, was a permissible method of dealing the problem. Congress had learned that substantial voting discrimination presently occurs in certain sections of the country, and it knew no way of accurately forecasting whether the evil might spread elsewhere in the future.

In acceptable legislative fashion, Congress chose to limit its attention to the geographic areas where immediate action seemed necessary. The doctrine of the equality of states, invoked by South Carolina, does not bar this approach, for that doctrine applies only to the terms upon which states are admitted to the union, and not to the remedies for local evils which have subsequently appeared.

Coverage Formula

We now consider the related question of whether the specific states and political subdivisions within Section 4 (b) of the Act were an appropriate target for the new remedies. South Carolina contends that the coverage formula is awkwardly designed in a number of respects and that it disregards various local conditions, which have nothing to do with racial discrimination. These arguments, however, are largely beside the point.

To be specific, the new remedies of the Act are imposed on three states — Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi—in which Federal courts have repeatedly found substantial voting discrimination. Section 4 (b) of the act also embraces two other states—Georgia and South Carolina—plus large portions of a third state — North Carolina — for which there was more fragmentary evidence of recent voting discrimination mainly adduced by the Justice Department and the Civil Rights Commission. All of these areas were appropriately subjected to the new remedies. In identifying past evils, Congress obviously may avail itself of information from any probative source.

The areas listed above, for which there was evidence of actual voting discrimination, share two characteristics incorporated by Congress into the coverage formula: the use of tests and devices for voter registration, and a voting rate in the 1964 Presidential election at least 12 points below the national average. Tests and devices are relevant to voting discrimination because of their long history as a tool for perpetrating the evil; a low voting rate is pertinent for the obvious reason that widespread disenfranchisement must inevitably affect the number of actual voters.

Accordingly, the coverage formula is rational in both practice and theory.

Misuse of Tests

It is irrelevant that the coverage formula excludes certain localities which do not employ voting tests and devices but for which there is evidence of voting discrimination by other means. Congress had learned that widespread and persistent discrimination in voting during recent years has typically entailed the misuse of tests and devices, and this was the evil for which the new remedies were specifically designed.

Acknowledging the possibility of overbreadth, the act provides for termination of special statutory coverage at the behest of states and political subdivisions in which the danger of substantial voting discrimination has not

South Carolina's argument to the contrary, Congress might appropriately limit litigation under this provision to a single court in the District of Columbia, pursuant to its constitutional power under Art. III, Sec. 1, to "ordain and establish" inferior Federal tribunals.

South Carolina contends that these termination procedures are a nullity because they impose an impossible burden of proof upon states and political subdivision entitled to relief. As the Attorney General pointed out during hearings on the act, however, an area need do no more than to submit affidavits from voting officials, asserting that they have not been guilty of racial discrimination through the use of tests and devices during the past five years, and then to refute whatever evidence to the contrary may be adduced by the Federal Government.

Suspension of Tests

We now arrive at consideration of the specific remedies prescribed by the Act for areas included within the coverage formula. South Carolina assails the temporary suspension of existing voting qualifications. The record shows that in most of the states covered by the Act, including South Carolina, various tests and devices have been instituted with the purpose of disenfranchising Negroes, have been framed in such a way as to facilitate this aim, and have been administered in a discriminatory fashion for many years. Under these circumstances, the 15th Amendment has clearly been violated.

The Act suspends literacy tests and similar devices for a period of five years from the last occurrence of substantial voting discrimination. This was a legitimate response to the problem, for which there is ample precedent in 15th Amendment cases.

Underlying the response was the feeling that states and political subdivisions which had been allowing white illiterates to vote for years could not sincerely complain about "dilution" of their electorates through the registration of Negro illiterates. Congress knew that continuance of the tests and devices in use at the present time, no matter how fairly administered in the future, would freeze the effect of past discrimination in favor of unqualified white registrants. Congress permissibly rejected the alternative of requiring a complete re-registration of all voters, believing that this would be too harsh on many whites who had enjoyed the franchise for their entire adult lives.

Review of New Rules

The Act suspends new voting regulations pending scrutiny by Federal authorities to determine whether their use would violate the 15 Amendment. This may have been an uncommon exercise of Congressional Power, as South Carolina contends, but the Court has recognized that exceptional conditions can justify legislative measures not otherwise appropriate.

Congress knew that some of the states covered by Sec. 4 (b) of the Act had resorted to the extraordinary strategem of contriving new rules of various kinds for the sole purpose of perpetuating voting discrimination in the face of adverse Federal decrees. Congress had reason to suppose that these states might try similar maneuvers in the future, in order to evade the remedies for voting discrimination contained in the Act itself. Under the compulsion of these unique circumstances, Congress responded in a permissibly decisive manner.

For reasons already stated, there was nothing inappropriate about limiting litigation under this provision to the District Court for the District of Columbia, and in putting the burden of proof on the areas seeking relief.

The Act authorizes the apcants who are thereafter entitled to vote, subject to an expeditious challenge procedure. This was clearly an appropriate response to the problem, closely related to remedies authorized in prior cases.

After enduring nearly a century of widespread resistance to the 15th Amendment, Congress has marshalled an array of potent weapons against the evil, with authority in the Attorney General to employ them effectively. Many of the areas directly affected by this development have indicated their willingness to abide by any restraints legitimately imposed upon them.

We here hold that the portions of the Voting Rights Act properly before us are a valid means for carrying out the commands of the 15th Amendment. Hopefully, millions of nonwhite Americans will now be able to participate for the first time on an equal basis in the Government under which they live.

We may finally look forward to the day when truly "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

The bill of complaint is dismissed.

Black's Dissent

Mr. Justice Black, concurring and dissenting.

I agree with substantially all of the Court's opinion sustaining the power of Congress under Section 2 of the 15th Amendment to suspend state literacy tests and smilar voting qualifications and to authorize the Attorney General to appoint Federal examiners to register qualified voters in various section of the country.

Though, as I have said, I agree with most of the Court's conclusions, I dissent from its holding that every part of Section 5 of the act is constitutional.

Section 4 (a), to which section 5 is linked, suspends for five years all literacy tests and similar devices in those states coming within the formula of Section 4 (b). Section 5 goes on to provide that a state covered by Section 4 (b) can in no way amend its constitution or laws relating to voting without first trying to persuade the Attorney General of the United States or the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia that the new proposed laws do not have the purpose and will not have the effect of denying the right to vote to citizens on account of their race or color.

I think this section is unconstitutional on at least two grounds.

A Case for the Court

(A) The Constitution gives Federal courts jurisdiction over cases and controversies only. If it can be said that any case or controversy arises under this section which gives the District Court for the District of Columbia jurisdiction to approve or reject state laws or constitutional amendments, then the case or controversy must be between a state and the United States Government.

But it is hard for me to believe that a justiciable controversy can arise in the constitutional sense from a desire by the United States Government or some of its officials to determine in advance what legislative provisions a state may enact or what constitutional amendments it may adopt. If this dispute between the Federal Government and the states amounts to a case or controversy it is a far cry from the traditional constitutional notion of a case or controversy as a dispute over the meaning of enforceable laws or the manner in which they are applied.

And if by this section Congress has created a case or controversy, and I do not believe it has, then it seems to me that the most appropriate

Certainly if all the provisions of our Constitution which limit the power of the Federal Government and reserve other power to the states are to mean anything, they mean at least that the states have power to pass laws and amend their constitutions without first sending their officials hundreds of miles away to beg Federal authorities to approve them.

Moreover, it seems to me that Section 5 which gives Federal officials power to veto state laws they do not like is in direct conflict with the clear command of our Constitution that "the United States shall guarantee to every state in this union a republican form of government."

I cannot hel pbut believe that the inevitable effect of any such law which forces any one of the states to entreat Federal authorities in far-away places for approval of local laws before they can become effective is to create the impression that the state or states treated in this way are little more than conquered provinces."

High Court Refuses to Hear Appeal by Judge Chandler

WASHINGTON, March 7 (AP)—The Supreme Court refused today to hear an appeal by Judge Stephen S. Chandler of the United States District Court in Oklahoma City on an order disqualifying him from trying a case involving Texaco, Inc.

The order was issued by the United States Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit in Denver. It said Judge Chandler's connection with one of the attorneys for several individuals who sued Texaco for services provided was sufficient to require the judge's disqualification.

Judge Chandler's appeal to the Supreme Court contended that the Circuit Court had acted "without any vestige of jurisdiction." It urged that "power of the intermediate appellate courts to control the independence of the trial judiciary should be strictly limited and carefully defined."

By FRED P. GRAHAM
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 7 — The Supreme Court upheld today the major provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and thus cleared the way for large-scale participation by Negroes in this year's elections in the Deep South.

The action was virtually unanimous. Justice Hugo L. Black noted with "regret" a dissent on a minor point, stating that he believed that one section of the law to be unconstitutional.

Otherwise, the Supreme Court was solidly behind Chief Justice Earl Warren's detailed, 31-page opinion.

In brief, the act suspends the literacy and other tests for voting in six Southern states—Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina and Virginia.

It authorizes the Attorney General to dispatch Federal examiners to areas that attempt to evade the law. So far, examiners have been sent to eight counties in the Deep South.

Speed Deemed Essential

In September South Carolina brought suit directly in the Supreme Court to enjoin the enforcement of the law. The Justices accelerated consideration of the case so that questions about the law's constitutionality could be cleared away before the primary elections this spring.

Today's decision did not affect the provision of the law that nullifies New York State's English language literacy requirement for persons who have completed six years in American-flag schools that teach primarily Spanish.

Lower courts have divided on the constitutionality of this section, which was inserted by New York's Senators to extend the franchise to Puerto Ricans literate in Spanish. The Supreme Court is expected to rule on the issue before it adjourns in June.

Poll Tax Unaffected

The decision also did not affect the issue of poll taxes. Under a section of the voting law not involved in today's case the Justice Department was instructed to bring court challenges in the four states that still require payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting in state elections.

However, an appeal already challenging the Virginia poll tax reached the Supreme Court first, and it is expected to rule soon.

The unanimity of today's decision raised strong hopes among civil rights lawyers that the Court would quickly declare poll taxes unconstitutional.

Chief Justice Warren's opin-

on today approved the seven provisions that make up the heart of the law. Other less important sections of the law were not challenged in the suit and therefore were not passed upon by the Court. "Hopefully," the Chief Justice said, "millions of nonwhite Americans will now be able to participate for the first time on an equal basis in the Government under which they live."

The decision turned upon a finding that the law was an appropriate means for carrying out Congress's authority under the 15th Amendment to prohibit racial discrimination in voting.

It remarked that Congress had felt itself to be confronted with the "insidious and pervasive evil" of voting discrimination, and that it had resorted to "sterner and more elaborate measures" than the previous laws that had failed to prevent such discrimination.

South Carolina had contended that voting qualifications were within the powers reserved to the states, and that Congress's power under the 15th Amendment could reach only discrimination flowing from them—not the qualifications themselves.

Rejecting this argument in strong terms, the Court ruled that Congress has "full remedial powers" to strike down vehicles of voting discrimination, so long as the means used were not otherwise specifically prohibited.

Trigger Clause Attacked

The Southern states' attack had also been directed at the law's "trigger" provision. This automatically applied the substantive sections to any state or county in which fewer than 50 per cent of the voting-age residents were registered on Nov. 1, 1964, or voted in the Presidential election of 1964.

They made much of the fact that Alaska, 26 counties in North Carolina, three counties in Arizona, a county in Hawaii and one county in Idaho were also caught up by this formula.

Also areas of Arkansas, Texas and northern Florida, with large Negro populations but few Negro voters, were not before enacting new laws covering voting qualifications, because recent history showed that states could overcome Federal antidiscrimination laws by passing a succession of new statutes of their own.

Black Voices Regret

Justice Black dissented on this point. In his remarks from the bench, he regretted that "in order to accomplish a wonderful purpose we are compelled to go so far—to treat the states as though they were not states."

He remarked that if the Attorney General turned down a proposed state law and the state took it to court in Washington, this would be an advisory opinion prohibited by Federal practice. If any court were to hear such a case it should be the Supreme Court, he said.

Furthermore, this procedure "so distorts our constitutional structure of government as to render any distinction drawn in the Constitution between state and Federal power almost meaningless."

As of March 1, Federal examiners have certified 101,370 persons — mostly Negroes — as qualified for registration. However, few of these have been placed on the rolls by Southern registrars.

Officials in the covered states obtained court orders from state judges prohibiting the registrars from adding the names, on the ground that the act was unconstitutional.

Now that the law has been held constitutional, the Justice Department expects the names to be enrolled soon. A spokesman said today that court actions would be commenced immediately if this was not done.

State registrars had voluntarily registered about 201,000 as of Feb. 1, which means that almost 40 per cent of the 2.4 million voting-age Negroes in the five affected states are now registered.

South Carolina was joined in its challenge by the five other southern states affected. Twenty states supported the Government's position as friends of the court.

David W. Robinson 2d of Columbia, S. C. argued for South Carolina.

Arguing as amicus curiae for hibit racial discrimination in voting.

It remarked that Congress had felt itself to be confronted with the "insidious and pervasive evil" of voting discrimination, and that it had resorted to "sterner and more elaborate measures" than the previous laws that had failed to prevent such discrimination.

South Carolina had contended that voting qualifications were within the powers reserved to the states, and that Congress's power under the 15th Amendment could reach only discrimination flowing from them—not the qualifications themselves.

Rejecting this argument in strong terms, the Court ruled that Congress has "full remedial powers" to strike down vehicles of voting discrimination, so long as the means used were not otherwise specifically prohibited.

Trigger Clause Attacked

The Southern states' attack had also been directed at the law's "trigger" provision. This automatically applied the substantive sections to any state or county in which fewer than 50 per cent of the voting-age residents were registered on Nov. 1, 1964, or voted in the Presidential election of 1964.

They made much of the fact that Alaska, 26 counties in North Carolina, three counties in Arizona, a county in Hawaii and one county in Idaho were also caught up by this formula.

Also areas of Arkansas, Texas and northern Florida, with large Negro populations but few Negro voters, were not covered because they do not use literacy tests.

Ruling that Congress can use "any rational means" to enforce the 15th Amendment, the Court brushed these contentions aside and found that the "trigger" was rational both in practice and theory.

This came as a boon to Justice Department officials who are drafting the Administration's anti-discrimination jury bill. They are reported to be considering a similar "trigger" to reach counties where the percentage of Negroes on jury lists is deemed too low. The decision today affords strong evidence that such a device would be upheld by the Court.

The Cheif Justice disposed of the other challenges to the act in short order by holding:

¶The suspension of state literacy requirements does not arbitrarily add Negro illiterates to the rolls, because Congress has evidence that white illiterates have been registered in many areas, despite the tests.

¶The 10-day period granted to state officials to challenge persons enrolled by Federal examiners is not too short, because challengers have been used in the past to harass Negroes.

¶Congress could properly require officials of covered counties or states to come into the District Court of the District of Columbia to prove they had not used their tests to discriminate. This is within its power to "ordain and establish" inferior Federal tribunals.

¶The procedure for proving non-discrimination is fair, since the mere filing of affadavits in the District of Columbia by state officials shifts the burden upon the Government to prove that the state or county has discriminated.

¶Congress could properly require covered states to obtain the Attorney General's approval ion prohibited by Federal practice. If any court were to hear such a case it should be the Supreme Court, he said.

Furthermore, this procedure "so distorts our constitutional structure of government as to render any distinction drawn in the Constitution between state and Federal power almost meaningless."

ATLANTA, Ga., March 7 (AP) — Louisiana's Attorney General said today the Supreme Court's decision on the voting law was "another step in the total destruction" of states rights.

Georgia's Governor took the attitude that "it won't affect us."

The two statements represented the wide range of reaction to the decision.

Mr. Gremillion, Louisiana's Attorney General, said that the Court's decision 'means that the Federal judiciary and the Federal government have taken over the field of state registration of voters.

"This is really another step in the total destruction of the rights of states to regulate their internal affairs," he said. "It also will undoubtedly lead to universal sufferage."

Attorney General Patterson of Mississippi went further, predicting the decision might open the door to Federal control of elections.

"The Court has upheld the right of Congress to prescribe voting qualifications irrespective of state laws," he said.

Mr. Patterson said that Congress had developed a formula to cover several Southern states that gave the Federal government "control of their registration situations" and "can as easily set up another formula to cover 50 states."

"The Supreme Court has spoken," was the reaction of both Gov. Carl E. Sanders and Attorney General. Arthur K. Bolton of Georgia.

"Federal registrars have not been necessary in Georgia since the passage of this law," Mr. Sanders said, "and I do not believe they will be needed in the future."

Mr. Bolton and Mr. Sanders said that Georgia officials would continue to obey the law. The Governor added that "any citizen has the right to register and vote without regard to race, creed or color."

There was no immediate comment from South Carolina officials, who filed the test suit, or from Alabama's Governor, George C. Wallace, or Attorney General, Mr. Flowers.

Georgia Negro leaders who just concluded a session in Albany have been urged to push voter registration and not to make any early commitments to political candidates.

Jesse Hill of Atlanta addressed the statewide meeting of "Operation Breadbasket" on the subject, "Voter Registration and Political Action."

Hill declared that he was "greatly concerned that we as Negroes do not have more effective or better statewide coordination and support in voter registration and political action."

Hill said that on Monday he will ask the Voter Registration Project of the Southern Regional Council to "immediately finance a statewide forum and coordinating group to improve the lagging program of voter registration in Georgia before the books close for the upcoming congressional and state elections."

He added, "Georgia is subject to the Voting Rights Law and from information we are now studying, I predict that federal voting registrars will be requested for many Georgia counties within the next 45 to 60 days and I feel certain that the Justice department will send them, and many of these registrars will be Negroes."

Hill said the "basic problems of Albany Negroes are not just Albany problems, they are problems for Georgia Negroes to consider by coalition and coordination if we are to have a posture of strength in pursuing them instead of our historically ill-formed, weak, pleading and begging position."

"I suggest," Hill said, "that we give special attention to the Second Congressional District where there are 132,000 eligible Negro citizens against 75,135 white, and white voters outnumber Negroes two to one."

The Negro leader further declared that "the worst thing we can do" is to "get involved in making commitments to potential candidates" at this early date.

Hill said that on Jan. 1, there were 265,081 Negroes registered to vote in Georgia. He said reports show that Georgia Negroes are lagging behind other states in registering since the Voting Rights Bill passed.

Changes in Election Rules Balk Negro Bids for Office in South

VOTING

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

NEWTON, Ga., March 10—Southern Negroes are encountering major obstacles in their attempts to elect public officials under the Federal Voting Rights Act of 1965, which became effective seven months ago.

Their problem was dramatized today when an election, in which a Negro candidate had been favored, failed to come off here in Baker County in southwest Georgia.

Amid growing white concern over the possibility of having a Negro officeholder for the first time in this century, the county's all-white Board of Commissioners canceled the election. It also abolished the post of justice of the peace that the Negro and a white candidate had been seeking.

The commission chairman, Price Hall, denied that the racial issue was involved in the board's action. He said that board members had suddenly decided, after the campaign was under way, to "consolidate" the county's petit courts.

Charge by Rights Leaders

Civil rights leaders here charged that the board had taken its action solely to prevent the election of Walter Singletary, a 65-year-old Negro farmer. They said Mr. Singletary had learned that the office had been abolished less than four days before the election was to be held and only after he had printed campaign posters and had formally qualified as a candidate.

It was the latest in a series of complaints in recent weeks from civil rights workers who are attempting to mobilize newly enfranchised Negro voters in an effort to elect Negro candidates.

In Alabama, the Democratic executive committee in predominantly Negro Lowndes County voted a ten-fold increase in the filing fee for candidates in the May Democratic primary. The new fee of $500 for a sheriff candidate, civil rights workers charged, makes political campaigns prohibitively expensive for Negroes in a county where per capita income is $507 a year.

Terms Are Extended

When would-be Negro candidates reported to the courthouse two weeks ago in predominantly Negro Bullock County, Ala., to qualify formally as candidates for County Commissioner, they discovered that there were no vacancies for the office this year. In the waning days of its session last year, the Alabama Legislature quietly extended the terms of the Bullock County Commissioners by two years, thus eliminating any necessity for an immediate election.

"The bill completely slipped by us," an Alabama newspaperman said. "There was no way Negroes could have known about the change. Reporters didn't even know about it."

In Mississippi testimony in a Federal Court hearing showed Negro that candidates had learned only after the filing deadline passed three weeks ago that the qualification procedures had been changed in the races for local school boards. The state's white superintendents had been alerted in advance of the change in election practices.

Negro candidates, meanwhile, complained to the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under Law, which succeeded in winning a Federal injunction against the enforcement of the election changes in three school board races.

In each incident in Alabama, Mississippi and Georgia, white officials denied that increasing Negro voter registration had prompted their decision to change election procedures, while Negroes contended that this had been the sole reason.

Vote: Now for a New Era in South

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 12 — One year ago when the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was leading demonstrations in Alabama for Federal voting legislation he noted that in many ways Southern Negroes had a better life than those who had migrated to the ghettos of the North. Many owned small farms, he said, and most participated in a stable community life that gave them a measure of emotional security. What was lacking, Dr. King said, was political power that would give Negroes a voice in the state capitals, the county court houses and the city halls.

This week, the Supreme Court removed the last obstacle to free participation by Negroes at the polls by upholding the main sections of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The way is now clear for a long-awaited transformation of politics in the Deep South.

"After enduring nearly a century of widespread resistance to the 15th Amendment" to the Constitution, Chief Justice Earl Warren wrote in the controlling opinion, "Congress has marshaled an array of potent weapons against the evil. . . . We may finally look forward to the day when truly 'the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude.'"

Reason for Dissent

The lone dissent was on a minor section of the act. Justice Hugo L. Black said he did not think Congress had authority to tell states they must have the approval of the Attorney General or the Federal courts before enacting new laws governing voting qualifications.

Under the automatic triggering device in the act, tests have been suspended in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia and 26 counties of North Carolina. Since the act was signed last Aug. 6, Attorney General Nicholas DeB. Katzenbach has assigned examiners to 37 counties and promised to send others wherever local officials in the seven-state area use literacy tests or other devices to prevent free and easy access to the registration books.

In the last seven months, Federal examiners have enrolled more than 100,00 Negro citizens. Local officials acting in voluntary compliance with the act have registered at least another 200,000 in the five Deep South states principally affected. This brings to about 950,000 the number of Negro names on the registration books, still only about 40 per cent of those eligible.

But with legal resistance virtually at an end, with the coming of warm weather and political campaigns and with the renewal of registration drives the number registered may increase sharply in the next few months. Mr. Katzenbach told civil rights leaders in Atlanta the other day he hopes and expects that more than half of the voting-age Negro population in the five states will participate in this year's elections in each of the states.

Registration Tripled

Already the act has worked magic in some areas. Negro registrations have more than tripled in Mississippi. Birmingham, a center of resistance to Negro advances, may soon have more registered Negroes than Atlanta, where Negroes have long participated in political life.

No one, however, expects a transformation overnight. Civil rights groups face a tremendous task in politically activating an enormous reservoir of Negro citizens who have never voted and have never tried. Negro leaders have said demonstrations of the kind seen in Birmingham recently may be necessary in some areas to get the people out and to convince the Justice Department that more examiners are needed.

But the South is not likely ever again to produce the kind of racist politics that marred the region much of this century. With rare exceptions the registration of Negroes in large numbers has eliminated race as an important issue in political campaigns.

There is one possibility, however, that worries officials in Washington and in the South. It is that politics could become so polarized in some areas that a white party and a black party developed with each discouraging membership or support from the other race. It is too early to tell if this will happen.

A New Mood

It has not happened in states like Tennessee and in pockets of the Deep South where Negroes have voted freely for some time. There they have sought to defeat the racists and elect both moderate whites and Negroes to office.

There is, however, a new mood of Negro militancy in the South and in many areas whites are still trying to keep both parties free of Negro participation. In the Alabama Black Belt, where Negroes generally outnumber whites, a number of Negro candidates have entered the spring primaries for local office.

The immediate responsibility for integration of politics, officials say, rests with both national parties, which can go a long way toward stamping out racism in their Southern branches and with Negro and white leaders in the areas involved.

About 60 Negro political candidates from Alabama will attend a workshop here sponsored by the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) and aimed at acquainting them "with the duties of the elective positions they are seeking."

The workshop will be held Saturday from 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. at the Ebenezer Baptist Church educational building, 413 Auburn Ave. The church is copastored by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., head of SCLC.

The workshop is being sponsored by SCLC's citizenship education program, headed by Dr. Robert L. Green, and its voter registration and political education department, headed by Hosea L. Williams.

DR. GREEN SAID SCLC's assumption was not that the candidates have little awareness of the duties of the offices they seek, but that the awareness should be "thorough."

"Negro candidates will not have initially the support that white candidates will have; we want to make sure they have a very adequate and precise knowledge of their duties. We want to reinforce whatever knowledge they might have," he said.

Included in the speaker's list will be two Negro county commissioners from Virginia and South Carolina, a Negro deputy sheriff from Virginia and a Negro tax collector from Virginia.

Local speakers will be State Sen. Leroy Johnson, Rev. J. D. Grier, Rev. Andrew J. Young, Dr. Vivian Henderson and Dr. King.

HIGH COURT VOIDS VIRGINIA POLL TAX IN BROAD DECISION

Ruling Seen Marking End of Fees as Vote Qualification —3 Other States Affected

14TH AMENDMENT CITED

6-3 Opinion Holds Wealth Is 'Capricious Factor'—Race Not an Issue in Finding

Excerpts from court opinion are printed on Page 44.

By FRED P. GRAHAM
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 25 — The Supreme Court declared Virginia's poll tax unconstitutional today in a decision broad enough to eliminate the other existing poll taxes in Alabama, Mississippi and Texas.

Today's 6 to 3 decision brought to a successful conclusion a long campaign by civil rights advocates to abolish poll taxes as a prerequisite for voting.

Because the Court had ruled in 1937, and again in 1951, that poll taxes were constitutional, these advocates had turned to legislative activity.

This produced repeal of poll taxes by eight states, elimination of poll taxes in Federal elections through the 24th Amendment to the Constitution and a provision in the Voting Rights Act of 1965 condemning poll taxes — only to have the Supreme Court say this morning that the 14th Amendment of 1868 rendered unconstitutional all poll taxes on voting.

Opinion by Douglas

In an opinion by Justice William O. Douglas, the Court ruled today that Virginia's $1.50 tax as a prerequisite for voting in state elections violated the equal protection of the law guaranteed by the 14th Amendment.

Leaning heavily upon the Court's "one man, one vote" doctrine for his authority, Justice Douglas overruled the unanimous 1937 decision of Breedlove v. Suttles, that had found a similar Georgia poll tax to be constitutional.

He did not mention a terse, unsigned 1951 decision in which the Court upheld the Virginia law itself over his lone dissent.

First Amendment Linked

Although the plaintiffs in the two consolidated cases were Negroes, the Court's decision was based on economic and not racial descrimination. In both cases three-judge Federal District Courts had found that the Virginia poll tax was not used to discriminate against Negroes and had upheld the constitutionality of the law.

The Justice Department entered the case as a friend of the court and agreed that no racial discrimination was involved. Solicitor General Thurgood Marshall argued, instead, that the law violated what he termed the First Amendment's guarantee of free political expression by imposing a burden on voting that had no rational connection with voting qualifications.

Justice Douglas avoided the First Amendment issue, but agreed that a tax was not germane to voting. He said:

"To introduce wealth or payment of a fee as a measure of a voter's qualifications is to introduce a capricious or irrelevant factor. The degree of the discrimination is irrelevant. In this context — that is, as a condition to obtaining a ballot — the requirement of fee paying causes an invidious discrimination that runs afoul of the equal protection clause."

Justice Hugo L. Black charged that the Court's emphasis on "unreasonableness" under the equal protection clause gave the majority "a blank check" to write its ideas of good governmental policy into the Constitution.

Due Process Cited

He compared this with the Court's since-abandoned practice of striking down economic regulatory legislation as "unreasonable" under the due process clause.

In a dissenting opinion joined by Justice Potter Stewart, Justice John M. Harlan pointed out that the 24th Amendment had been considered necessary to abolish the poll tax in Federal elections.

For the Supreme Court to administer the coup de grace by "judicial fiat" should be "a matter of continuing concern to all interested in maintaining the proper role of this tribunal under our scheme of Government," he said.

Justice Harlan also agreed with Justice Blacks' statement that payment of a poll tax could be a reasonable basis for determining who is competent to vote.

Justice Douglas's opinion dealt only with the poll tax provision of the Virginia Constitution of 1902. It ignored another section of that Constitution that denied the franchise to "paupers."

But this statement, that a state violates the Constitution "whenever it makes the affluence of the voter or payment of any fee an electoral

Excerpts From Majority Opinion and Dissents in Poll Tax Decision

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, March 24—Following are excerpts from the Supreme Court opinion holding the Virginia poll tax unconstitutional, and dissents by Justice John M. Harlan, with whom Justice Potter Stewart joined, and Justice Hugo L. Black:

MAJORITY OPINION
Mr. Justice Douglas

These are suits by Virginia residents to have declared unconstitutional Virginia's poll tax. The three-judge District Court, feeling bound by our decision in Breedlove v. Suttles, 302 U.S. 277, dismissed the complaint. See 240 F. Supp. 270. The cases came here on appeal and we noted probable jurisdiction.

While the right to vote in Federal elections is conferred by Art. 1, Section 2, of the Constitution, the right to vote in state elections is nowhere expressly mentioned. It is argued that the right to vote in state elections is implicit, particularly by reason of the First Amendment and that it may not constitutionally be conditioned upon the payment of a tax or fee. We do not stop to canvass the relation between voting and political expression. For it is enough to say that once the franchise is granted to the electorate, lines may not be drawn which are inconsistent with the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment.

That is to say, the right of suffrage "is subject to the imposition of state standards which are not discriminatory and which do not contravene any restriction that Congress, acting pursuant to its constitutional power, has imposed." Lassiter v. Northampton Education Board, 360 U.S. 45, 51.

We were speaking there of a state literacy test which we sustained, warning that the result would be different if a literacy test, fair on its face, were used to discriminate against a class. But the Lassiter case does not govern the result here, because, unlike a poll tax, the "ability to read and write . . . has some relation to standards designed to promote intelligent use of the ballot."

14th Amendment Held Violated

We conclude that a state violates the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment whenever it makes the affluence of the voter or payment of any fee an electoral standard. Voter qualifications sidering charges that voters in one part of the state had greater representation per person in the state Legislature than voters in another part of the state. We concluded:

"A citizen, a qualified voter, is no more nor no less so because he lives in the city or on the farm. This is the clear and strong command of our Constitution's equal protection clause. This is an essential part of the concept of a government of laws and not men. This is at the heart of Lincoln's vision of 'government of the people, by the people, for the people.'"

System Is Barred

We say the same whether the citizen, otherwise qualified to vote, has $1.50 in his pocket or nothing at all, pays the fee or fails to pay it. The principle that denies the state the right to dilute a citizen's vote on account of his economic status or other such factors by analogy bars a system which excludes those unable to pay a fee to vote or who fail to pay.

It is argued that a state may exact fees from citizens for many different kinds of licenses; that if it can demand from all an equal fee for a driver's license, it can demand from all an equal poll tax for voting. But we must remember that the interest of the state, when it comes to voting, is limited to the power to fix qualifications. Wealth, like race, creed or color, is not germane to one's ability to participate intelligently in electoral process. Lines drawn on the basis of wealth or property, like those of race, are traditionally disfavored. To introduce wealth or payment of a fee as a measure of a voter's qualifications is to introduce a capricious or irrelevant factor. The degree of the discrimination is irrelevant.

DISSENT
Mr. Justice Harlan
Mr. Justice Stewart

The final demise of state poll taxes, already totally proscribed by the 24th Amendment with respect to Federal elections and abolished by the states themselves in all but four states with respect to state elections, is perhaps in itself not of great moment. But the fact that the coup de grace has been administered by this Court instead of being left to the affected states or to the Federal political process should be a matter of its other breaks with the past, also marked a departure from these traditional and wise principles. Unless its "one man, one vote" thesis of state legislative apportionment is to be attributed to the unsupportable proposition that "equal protection" simply means indiscriminate equality, it seems inescapable that what Reynolds really reflected was but this Court's own views of how modern American representative government should be run. For it can hardly be thought that no other method of apportionment may be considered rational.

Following Reynolds the Court in Carrington v. Rash applied the traditional equal protection standard in striking down a Texas statute disqualifying as voters in state elections certain members of the armed forces of the United States. But today in holding unconstitutional state poll taxes and property qualifications for voting and pro tanto overruling Breedlove v. Suttles, and Butler v. Thompson, the Court reverts to the highly subjective judicial approach manifested by Reynolds.

In substance the Court's analysis of the equal protection issue goes no further than to say that the electoral franchise is "precious" and "fundamental," and to conclude that "to introduce wealth or payment of a fee as a measure of a voter's qualifications is to introduce a capricious or irrelevant factor." These are of course captivating phrases, but they are wholly inadequate to satisfy the standard governing adjudication of the equal protection issue: Is there a rational basis for Virginia's poll tax as a voting qualification? I think the answer to that question is undoubtedly "yes."

A Traditional Feature

Property qualifications and poll taxes have been a traditional part of our political structure. In the colonies the franchise was generally a restricted one. Over the years these and other restrictions were gradually lifted, primarily because popular theories of political representation had changed. Often restrictions were lifted only after wide public debate. The issue of woman suffrage, for example, raised questions of family relationships, of participation in public affairs, of the very nature of the type of society in which Americans wished to live; eventually a consensus was reached, which culminated in the 19th Amendment.

Similarly with property qualifications, it is only by fiat that it can be said, especially in the context of American history, that there can be no rational debate as to their advisability. For example, it is certainly a rational argument that payment of some minimal poll tax promotes civic responsibility, weeding out those who do not care enough about public affairs to pay $1.50 or thereabouts a year for the exercise of the franchise.

These viewpoints, to be sure, ring hollow on most contemporary ears. Their lack of acceptance today is evidenced by the fact that nearly all of the states, left to their own devices, have eliminated property or poll-tax qualifications; by the cognate fact that Congress and three-quarters of the states quickly ratified the 24th Amendment; and by the fact that rules such as the "pauper exclusion" in Virginia law, Va. Const., Section 23, Va. Code, Section 24-18, have never been enforced.

Property and poll-tax qualifications, very simply, are not in accord with current egalitarian notions of how a modern democracy should be organized. It is of course entirely fitting that Legislatures should modify the law to reflect such changes in popular attitudes. However, it is all wrong, in my view, for the Court to adopt the political doctrines popularly accepted at a particular moment of our history and to declare all others to be irrational and invidious, barring them from the range of choice by reasonably minded people acting through the political process.

I would affirm the decision of the district court.

DISSENT
Mr. Justice Black

In Breedlove v. Sutties, decided Dec. 6, 1937, a few weeks after I took my seat as a member of this Court, we unanimously upheld the right of the State of Georgia to make payment of its state tax a prerequisite to voting in state elections. We rejected at that time contentions that the state law violated the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment because it put an unequal burden on different groups of people according to their age, sex, and ability to pay. In rejecting the contention that the law violated the equal protection clause the Court noted:

"While possible by statutory declaration to levy a poll tax upon every inhabitant of whatsoever sex, age or condition, collection from all would be impossible for always there are many too poor to pay."

Believing at that time that the Court had properly respected its power under the equal protection clause and was right in rejecting the equal protection argument, I joined the Court's judgment and opinion. Later, May 28, 1951, I joined the Court's judgment in Butler v. Thompson, upholding over the dissent of Mr. Justice Douglas, the Virginia state poll tax law challenged here against the same equal protection challenges. Since the Breedlove and Butler cases were decided the Federal Constitution has not been amended in the only way it could constitutionally have been, that is as provided in Article V of the Constitution. I would adhere to the holding of those cases. The Court, however, overrules Breedlove in part, but its opinion reveals that it does so not by using its limited power to interpret the original meaning of the equal protection clause, but by giving that clause a new meaning which it believes represents a better governmental policy. From this action I dissent.

It should be pointed out at once that the Court's decision is to no extent based on a finding that the Virginia law as written or as applied is being used as a device or mechanism to deny Negro citizens of Virginia the right to vote on account of their color. Apparently the Court agrees with the District Court below and with my brothers Harlan and Stewart that this record would not support any finding that the Virginia poll tax law the Court invalidates has any such effect.

If the record could support a finding that the law as written or applied has such an effect, the law would of course be unconstitutional as a violation of the 14th and 15th Amendments and also 42 U.S.C. Section 1971 (A). What the Court does hold is that the equal protection clause necessarily bars all states from making payment of a state tax, any tax, a prerequisite to voting.

elections.

For the Supreme Court to administer the coup de grace by "judicial flat" should be "a matter of continuing concern to all interested in maintaining the proper role of this tribunal under our scheme of Government," he said.

Justice Harlan also agreed with Justice Blacks' statement that payment of a poll tax could be a reasonable basis for determining who is competent to vote.

Justice Douglas's opinion dealt only with the poll tax provision of the Virginia Constitution of 1902. It ignored another section of that Constitution that denied the franchise to "paupers."

But this statement, that a state violates the Constitution "whenever it makes the affluence of the voter or payment of any fee an electoral standard," made it clear that neither the pauper provision nor the three remaining state poll taxes could stand.

Justice Black foreshadowed this result last month when he refused to stay the enforcement of a Federal District Court decision holding Texas' poll tax unconstitutional. Alabama's law had been ruled unconstitutional in a similar action.

Suits Were Filed

These suits were brought by the Justice Department, together with suits challenging the Virginia and Mississippi poll tax laws, under the command of a provision of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach had persuaded Congress not to attempt to abolish the four poll taxes in the 1965 law, by suggesting that the Court might do it in the two Virginia cases, which are already in litigation.

Under this reasoning, Administration forces were able to beat down efforts by liberal Senators, led by Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, to ban the poll taxes outright in the law. Instead, the Justice Department was instructed to bring the four suits.

In his dissenting remarks from the bench today Justice Black chided Congress for passing the buck to the Supreme Court, and speculated that it would have abolished the taxes by statute, if "some great enthusiast" had not persuaded it to wait.

Negroes Were Target

Although today's decision did not result from racial discrimination, the poll taxes of the 11 Southern states were enacted in the post-Reconstruction period for the admitted purpose of denying the vote to Negroes.

However, seven of them were repealed in a series of legislative reforms: North Carolina, 1920; Louisiana, 1934; Florida, 1937; Georgia, 1945; South Carolina, 1951; Tennessee 1953; and Arkansas, 1964. Vermont also had a requirement that poll taxes had to be paid in order to vote, which was repealed last month.

The first bill to eliminate poll taxes in Federal elections was introduced in Congress in 1939. This was finally accomplished when the 24th Amendment was ratified in 1964.

George D. Gibson, a private attorney rom Richmond, argued for Virginia in the cases decided today. Allison W. Brown Jr. of Washington, an attorney for the American Cvil Liberties Union, argued for the Negro plaintiffs from nearby Fairfax County, Va.

Robert L. Segar of Flint, Mich., argued for the plaintiffs from Norfolk County.

Statement by Godwin

RICHMOND, March 24 (AP) —Virginia's Gov. Mills E. Godwin made this brief comment:

"I have not seen the Court's opinion but as a practical matter its effect apparently will be to put elections for state and local offices on the same basis as elections for Federal offices insofar as the poll tax is concerned.

"The legal impact will be carefully examined with the Attorney General."

Governor Godwin was meeting with the Attorney General on another matter when the Court's decision was announced. He remained with him for more than an hour before issuing his statement.

acting pursuant to its constitutional power, has imposed." Lassiter v. Northampton Education Board, 360 U.S. 45, 51.

We were speaking there of a state literacy test which we sustained, warning that the result would be different if a literacy test, fair on its face, were used to discriminate against a class. But the Lassiter case does not govern the result here, because, unlike a poll tax, the "ability to read and write . . . has some relation to standards designed to promote intelligent use of the ballot."

14th Amendment Held Violated

We conclude that a state violates the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment whenever it makes the affluence of the voter or payment of any fee an electoral standard. Voter qualifications have no relation to wealth nor to paying or not paying this or any other tax. Our cases demonstrate that the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment restrains the states from fixing voter qualifications which invidiously discriminate. Thus without questioning the power of a state to impose reasonable residence restrictions on the availability of the ballot, we held in Carrington v. Rash, 380 U.S. 89, that a state may not deny the opportunity to vote to a bonafide resident merely because he is a member of the armed services. "By forbidding a soldier ever to controvert the presumption of nonresidence, the Texas Constitution imposes an invidious discrimination in violation of the 14th Amendment."

Previously we had said that neither homesite nor occupation "affords a permissible basis for distinguishing between qualified voters within the state." Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368, 380. We think the same must be true of requirements of wealth or affluence or payment of a fee.

Long ago in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, the Court referred to "the political franchise of voting" as a "fundamental political right, because preservative of all rights." Recently in Reynolds v. Sims, we said, "Undoubtedly, the right of suffrage is a fundamental matter in a free and democratic society. Especially since the right to exercise the franchise in a free and unimpaired manner is preservative of other basic civil and political rights, any alleged infringement of the right of citizens to vote must be carefully and meticulously scrutinized." There we were con-

I do not propose to retread ground covered in my dissents in Reynolds v. Sims, and Carrington v. Rash, and will proceed on the premise that the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment now reaches both state apportionment [Reynolds] and voter-qualification [Carrington] cases. My disagreement with the present decision is that in holding the Virginia poll tax violative of the equal protection clause the Court has departed from long-established standards governing the application of that clause.

The equal protection clause prevents states from arbitrarily treating people differently under their laws. Whether any such differing treatment is to be deemed arbitrary depends on whether or not it reflects an appropriate differentiating classification among those affected; the clause has never been thought to require equal treatment of all persons despite differing circumstances. The test evolved by this Court for determining whether an asserted justifying classification exists is whether such a classification can be deemed to be founded on some rational and otherwise constitutionally permissible state policy.. This standard reduces to a minimum the likelihood that the Federal judiciary will judge state policies in terms of the individual notions and predilections of its own members, and until recently it has been followed in all kinds of "equal protection" cases.

The United Klans of America plans to move into the voter registration field this summer, apparently with hopes of counteracting similar drives conducted by civil rights groups.

Calvin Craig, Georgia grand dragon, has written a letter to Fulton County Chief Registrar Leon Hay in which he asks that Klansmen be appointed deputy registrars.

The head klansman said in his letter that the klan wants to help unregistered white voters "who have been forgotten so long."

CITES NEGROES

Craig said in his letter that Hay had recently deputized nearly 200 Negroes to conduct a registration drive. The Negroes are members of the All-Citizens registration Commit tee. The committee hopes to register 27,000 persons by the September primaries.

Hay would not say whether he planned to grant the grand dragon's request, but he did acknowledge that he had received a letter from Craig.

MUST QUALIFY

However, The Constitution learned from other courthouse sources that klansmen would be allowed to serve as deputy registrars if they meet legal requirements.

One requirement is that a deputy registrar cannot have a criminal record. Before any klansmen are deputized, a record check will be made, it was learned.

Fulton County's chief registrar says Ku Klux Klansmen will be allowed to apply for service as deputy voter registrars because "We're not treating them any different than anybody else."

Chief Registrar Leon G. Hay confirmed Saturday that Klansmen are welcome to apply for the volunteer posts, but like everyone else, they will have to fill out questionnaires for examination by law enforcement authorities.

Georgia Grand Dragon Calvin Craig of the United Klans of America said he expects to get 40 to 50 Klan volunteers to canvass white neighborhoods.

"Hay deputized about 181 Negroes to go out and register Negroes," Craig said, "and we thought this was discriminating against white people."

CRAIG said he received a letter from Hay which stated klansmen may apply to attend a school for volunteers May 17.

Hay said he expects members of other organizations, among the Kiwanis, the Optimist Club and the Jaycees, to attend the same school.

The chief registrar said qualifications for a volunteer deputy registrar are that he must be a registered voter in the county and must not be under suspension of civil rights because of a felony conviction.

Hay said the volunteers' terms expire Dec. 31.

But Katzenbach Does Not Expect Trouble May 3

4/25/66

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 24—The Department of Justice intends to dispatch Federal observers to Alabama for the primary May 3 to prevent infractions against the Voting Rights Act of 1965, Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach said today.

In a televised interview on the Metromedia network, he said no trouble was envisioned and that he expected "local and state officials in all of these states to comply with the law."

He added:

"At the same time, there are obligations that the Federal Government has under the voting rights law and we're going to be prepared to meet them."

Mr. Katzenbach said that in addition to the United States Attorney's office, the Justice Department planned to have 33 offices open to consider complaints of noncompliance with the law. Moreover, he said that in some counties and precincts, there would be Federal observers on hand. He said that in at least one county, there had been requests for election supervision by observers.

Asked about press reports concerning threats of violence, Mr. Katzenbach replied that he had expected threats because of an extremist element in these areas.

"On the other hand," he said, "the record of the F.B.I. in terms of solutions of these crimes is very, very good indeed. I think that will serve as a deterrent to the carrying out of any serious threats of that kind."

Negro Participation Lauded by Civil Rights Leaders

VOTING

By EMANUEL PERLMUTTER

NYT 4/26/66

Attorney General Nicholas B. Katzenbach and spokesmen for civil rights groups hailed yesterday the voting in Tuesday's Democratic primary in Alabama in which Negroes participated widely for the first time since Reconstruction.

Mr. Katzenbach said he was pleased that Negroes had generally been able to vote there "freely and comfortably."

Interviewed in Washington as he arrived on Capitol Hill to testify in behalf of the Civil Rights bill of 1966, Mr. Katzenbach made the following comment:

"From the information which has reached me, at least in most areas the election was conducted fairly and well and people voted freely and comfortably.

"There may have been isolated incidents we haven't heard of, but over all it seems to be all right, and this reflects great credit to all the people involved for what was done."

Impact ISs Weighed

Civil rights spokesmen from their national headquarters in New York said that while the primary results mainly favored the segregationists, the Alabama Negroes had made their votes count.

They predicted that the Negro vote was bound to be a more important factor in the future.

The Alabama primary was the first significant election for Southern Negroes since the enactment of the Federal Voting Rights Act of 1965.

That act suspended literacy tests and other voting tests in six Southern states—Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina and Virginia.

It also authorized the Attorney General to dispatch Federal examiners to areas that might try to evade the law.

Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, noted that as a result of the election Alabama Negroes will be represented in the State Legislature.

"Incomplete returns," he added, "also indicate that they may have elected a sheriff and that some Negro candidates will be in runoffs in certain elections, and may win."

Mr. Wilkins went on to make this observation:

"The Negro voters need not be discouraged. Even though many of the candidates they supported failed in elections, these voters have already had an impact upon the conduct of elections in their state. Their influence will grow greater as their numbers increase and as they and the white voters forsake polarization at the polls."

CORE Evaluation

A spokesman for the Congress of Racial Equality said here it was heartening that Negroes and whites had voted "side by side" in Alabama. He predicted that the result would be psychologically helpful to the Negro.

He made the following assessment:

"The significant thing about the elections in Alabama was that this was the first time since Reconstruction that Negroes and whites were able to march side by side and vote for representatives of their state.

"It is estimated that 122,000 Negroes were able to vote. Whatever defeats occurred, a spirit of hope and a feeling of belonging that did not exist since Reconstruction has become a part of the ethos of the Negro drive for equality. The psychological results far outweigh any political adversities."

Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, called the Alabama voting a historic event.

Mr. Young said:

"The National Urban League hails Alabama's Negro citizens, who, laboring still under great handicaps, discharged their responsibilities as American citizens—many of them voting for the first time in their adult lives. History is in the making in that state."

Negro Vote Can Be Potent, If—

VOTING NYT 5/15/66

By TOM WICKER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 14 — In Newark, N. J., this week, in the Democratic primary, Mayor Hugh Addonizio failed to win a majority. The Mayor faces a runoff against his principal opponent, Leo P. Carlin, primarily because a third candidate, Kenneth A. Gibson, polled just under 20 per cent of the total vote.

Mr. Gibson is a 33-year-old Negro, and he was running in a city where Negroes make up almost 50 per cent of the population. In a larger field, and polling a few more votes than Mr. Gibson, another Negro, Calvin West, won election as a city councilman-at-large.

These results did not attract as much national attention as the Alabama Democratic primaries last week, and Newark is not really analogous to the South because the city's Negro community is a higher proportion of its total population than Negroes ever will achieve in any Southern state.

'Poor' Majority

But some political analysts here believe that, as more and more Negroes vote and reach political sophistication in the South, the Southern political order will develop somewhat like Newark's. They were influenced by the following realities of Southern politics:

(1) In the South, the dominant majority in the region as a whole and in every state is white—and the Negro proportion of the population is generally declining.

(2) Another majority exists in the South that is not, so far, dominant. It is the majority of the less advantaged, of whatever race—of those from the middle income groups ranging down to the poverty-stricken.

(3) For nearly a century, the white majority of the South has dominated the "poor" majority because the issue of race has been used to unite white men of whatever economic class—all too often for the benefit of the Bourbons.

The smashing victory of Mrs. Lurleen Wallace, running as a stand-in for her husband, Gov. George Wallace of Alabama, disclosed these underlying realities once again.

Resistance

There now are, in Alabama, 235,572 registered Negroes — and about 115,000 of these have been put on the polling books since the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Yet, the total is only 16 per cent of Alabama's registered voters, and in the period since the voting act was passed, so many whites were also registered that Negroes succeeded in "closing the gap" between their vote and the white vote by a net of only 12,000.

Moreover, the whites of Alabama were sufficiently united—no matter what their other interests—by two factors. Governor Wallace had made himself a symbol of white resistance to Federally imposed Negro gains. His wife's principal opponent, Attorney General Richmond Flowers, openly campaigned for the Negro vote. The race issue, however soft pedaled in speeches, was central to the election.

Mr. Flowers got an estimated 90 per cent of the Negro vote—suggesting that only about 150,000 Negroes voted in the gubernatorial race—but even with eight other candidates in the field, Mrs. Wallace won a majority of about 52 per cent and avoided a runoff. She is estimated to have received more than 60 per cent of the white vote.

Political Realities

Negroes did win Democratic nominations for some local offices, in electorates where their numbers were in higher proportion. In the Texas primary in the same week, three Negroes won nominations for the State Legislature.

All this suggests that astute Negro political leadership in the South will grasp two overriding facts: that the Negro in that region is a political minority and will remain so, and that when the issue of race is raised either by white bigots or by obvious Negro bloc voting, the white majority will unite at the ballot box, at least in the foreseeable future.

That is why the Newark results become relevant to the South. Newark showed that Negroes can influence important elections without trying to dominate them; that they need no longer be ignored or ridden over by white leaders. It showed that factors other than race—for instance, Mayor Addonizio's City Hall organization and powers—can influence the Negro as well as any other voter. It showed that important local offices can be won by Negroes—not only improving their present political power but building up experienced politicians (not merely Negro politicians) for the future.

New Order

Such an approach in the South appears numerically necessary, because of the Negro's permanent minority position. And it is the only route that offers any real hope anytime soon of uniting that other majority in the South—the vast body of whites and Negroes whose economic interests are identical.

Wherever the issue of race is openly raised, by whites or by Negroes, that majority is likely to be split, as it always has been before; where the race issue can be kept in the background, a new political order might be built in the South.

Democratic analysts appear to be particularly impressed by this long-term possibility. They believe their party offers the economic and social program upon which a big majority of the less advantaged — white and black — could agree, if racial politics could be avoided on both sides.

As Alabama showed, it is a big if.

Approximately 74 per cent of Alabama's Negro registered voters went to the polls during the May 3 primary, the Southern Regional Council said Sunday.

Returns from selected precincts showed the Negro vote could be calculated at about the total vote received by Atty. Gen. Richmond Flowers, who ran second to Mrs. George Wallace with 172,386, the council said.

Lurleen Wallace's nine male opponents would have to have had 72,845 more votes, the council reported, in order to force her into a runoff.

The council said Negro registration has more than doubled in Alabama since passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, rising from 113,000 to 235,000.

Currently about 49 per cent of the Negro voting age population is registered. White registration is 87 per cent.

Suit in Alabama Tests Voting Act

AJ 5/23/66

By JACK NELSON

Los Angeles Times News Service

Three sections of the 1965 Voting Rights Act that have not been tested in the U.S. Supreme Court are involved in the Justice Department's court action to protect Negro voting rights in four Alabama Black Belt counties.

In Greene, Sumter and Marengo counties, the Justice Department invoked Section 8 in a suit to enjoin county Democratic officials from barring federal observers—as they did in the Democratic primary May 3—from seeing how illiterates' ballots are marked in a May 31 runoff primary.

Officials of the three counties said they got unofficial advice from a federal judge before barring the observers in the first primary. The judge was identified as George H. Grooms of Birmingham, but he said he could not recall giving such advice.

U.S. District Judge Daniel H. Thomas of Mobile is expected to rule officially that Section 8 empowers observers to watch all aspects of officials' conduct at the polls, specifically including help given illiterates in the marking of ballots. He has set a hearing for Thursday on the Justice Department suit involving this section.

SECTIONS 11 and 12, dealing with discrimination by state officials and the filing of civil suits by the attorney general as a legal remedy, are involved in the Justice Department's suit to have Wilson Baker, former Selma public safety director, declared the Dallas County sheriff nominee over Sheriff James G. Clark.

Judge Thomas is considering that case after a two-day hearing in Selma.

None of Section 8 and 11 and only one small part of Section 12 are involved in the supreme court's decision March 7 upholding major portions of the Voting Rights Act.

However, Sections 11 and 12 are similar to provisions of the 1957 Civil Rights Act that already have been held constitutional.

Section 8 goes to the heart of congressional intent to insure that Negroes are permitted to cast their ballots freely and to have them properly counted.

IT DOES not specifically mention the casting of votes by illiterates whose ballots are marked by poll officials, but says observers shall see whether votes "are being properly tabulated."

The provision for federal observers apparently is one weapon the Supreme Court had in mind when it said, in the March 7 decision: "After enduring nearly a century of widespread resistance to the 15th Amendment, Congress has marshaled an array of potent weapons against the evil, with authority and the attorney general to employ them effectively."

In a memorandum of law filed with its suit against the Democratic officials of Greene, Sumter and Marengo counties, the Justice Department declared that the legislative history of this section reflects a congressional desire to insure that all phases of activity at polling places be fully observed.

Slum Negro Needs Close Issues in Order to Vote

VOTING 5/26/67

By TOM SEPPY

WASHINGTON (AP) — To get the Negro living in the city slums to register and vote, the League of Women Voters says, he must be hit with the issues close to him — garbage collection, police brutality charges, rats and even racial discrimination.

The Negro — as well as the Puerto Rican and the newcomer from Appalachia and other depressed rural areas living in the city's slums — is not concerned and cannot be reached by the usual get out the vote campaigns which deal in abstract values and long-range objectives, says a three-year study of elections in nine cities.

Techniques Suggested

The study, made public Wednesday night in the form of a manual, suggests techniques community organizations can use in reaching slum residents. It called them the eight of 10 citizens now disenfranchized by their absence from the registration lists.

Barriers to be overcome are not those presented by the normally apathetic voter, says the study. "They are those that apply specifically to this group of citizens; poor education, lack of confidence, fear, poverty, feelings of futility and lack of specific know-how.

The league says these psychological and mechanical barriers are not easy to remove. But it did learn that the combined efforts of many organizations and individuals, working together, could make a significant difference in registration and voting turnout by innercity residents.

"Once motivated, people will register — and they will vote," says the manual, entitled Voting is People Power. "Hit the nerve that makes them want the needed information; convince them that their voice is silent — silent when it comes to garbage collection, police brutality, rats, even discrimination — unless they register and vote.

Voting Policy

"Once they have seen that each vote is as important as any other vote, and know that voting sets the policy until the next election, they will register and vote. Education, work experience and social position do not by themselves make citizens alert and active. Wanting to vote and know-how do."

The League of Women Voters Education Fund conducted the project under a grant from the Sears-Roebuck Foundation and the Field Foundation.

The manual is based on registration drives in Bridgeport, Conn.; Cincinnati and Cleveland, Ohio; Indianapolis, Ind., Milwaukee, Wis.; Detroit, Mich.; Long Beach, Calif., New Orleans, La., and Rochester, N.Y.

Each section of the manual provides alternate techniques describing the advantages and disadvantages of each with warnings of problems that may arise and suggestions on how to meet them.

The manual warns that bipartisan organizers may not be welcomed with open arms by political parties.

"Political party officials do not generally consider registration efforts an innocuous nonpartisan activity, whatever your motives may be," says the manual. "Politicians prefer to concentrate their registration efforts on groups or on areas whose people are likely to vote for them."

Registration Lagging, Negroes Told

VOTING AC 5/26/66

Only Mississippi has a higher percentage of unregistered Negro voters than Georgia, the director of the Southern Regional Council's Voter Education Project said Wednesday.

The election of nine Negroes to the state Legislature, a figure topped only by Pennsylvania, could exert a negative influence on voter registration, the official, Vernon E. Jordon Jr., told a Hungry Club luncheon meeting at the Butler Street YMCA.

Mississippi's Negro voter registration figure stands at 27.8 per cent.

Georgia, with 42 per cent of her potential Negro electorate registered, is behind Alabama, which has a 49 per cent Negro registration, Jordon reported. Fulton County, with 54.9 per cent Negro registration, falls short of the 57.6 per cent figure in Montgomery, Ala., he said.

Negroes at the bottom of the socio-economic ladder have received no benefits from civil rights legislation, Jordan stated.

"Voter education must demonstrate to the Negro the relationship between his vote and the meat and bread issues that confront him day to day," he declared.

The logical Negro leadership in voter education, he said, is "the young, educated Negro, the Negro middle class." "Where else can the Negro masses turn?" he asked.

Jordon advocated a full-time, paid staff to coordinate civil rights action in the Atlanta Negro community and a full-time paid director for the All Citizens Registration Committee. Funds for these, he said, should be provided locally by Negro businessmen, churches, civic clubs and other organizations.

JACKSON, Miss. (UPI) — Thousands of Negroes vote for the first time in party primaries Tuesday but their newly won franchise was expected to have little impact on the outcome of the balloting.

Federal poll watchers will scrutinize the balloting in this state where only 35,000 Negroes were registered to vote a year ago. There are now 125,000 Negroes on the rolls, most of them registered under the 1965 Federal Voting Rights Act. There are about 475,000 White voters.

About 300,000 voters will go to the polls and the majority of white voters was expected to negate the impact of the new Negro voters.

U. S. Sen. James Eastland D-Miss., a staunch segregationist, is seeking his fifth term, and four incumbent Democratic congressmen seek renomination. Two Republican candidates are staging the state's first contest GOP primary since Reconstruction for the nomination to the seat being vacated by Rep. Prentiss Walker, who will run for the U.S. Senate in the general election. Four Democrats are in the primary for Walker's post.

A Man, One Vote

The Southern Regional Council notes that the shooting of James Meredith was at least the 17th incident related to Negro voter registration activity since the Voting Rights Act took effect last year.

This demonstrates, said the council, "that while the Voting Rights Act guaranteed rights of registration and voting, it did not guarantee the safety of those who are trying to see that those rights are exercised."

"Largely because of threats, reprisals, intimidation and fear, Mississippi's Negro registration . . . stands at . . . less than one-third of the Negro voting age population."

Georgia's Negro voter registration is low also. Apathy and lack of organized effort have been factors in that, and these are factors that Negro leaders bear an obligation to correct in an important election year. But there has been fear on the part of Negroes in Georgia also, and instances of intimidation.

What will be the Southern Negro's reaction? Will he go on tamely forfeiting his right to vote?

Efforts to intimidate voters have a way of backfiring when the citizenry has pride. A classic example occurred in Venezuela in 1963.

The Communist party deliberately embarked on a campaign to scare Venezuelans away from the ballot box as a means of blocking a free and democratic election.

Bombings, burnings and public murders occurred in Caracas and other cities. But the calculated campaign of intimidation and terror had a reverse effect.

It so angered Venezuelans that more than 90 per cent of the electorate thronged defiantly to the polling places on election day and elected an anti-Communist government. Moreover, the public reaction against the terror tactics smashed an incipient Communist "war of liberation" and drove the remnants of the Red movement into the mountains where they have hidden in ineffectual isolation ever since.

The Southern Negro has the same recourse against the segregationist efforts to intimidate him, if he will but muster the will to use it.

Federal Examiners

The Voting Rights Act authorizes the Attorney General to appoint Federal Examiners to list voters in those Parishes where:

1. He believes that the appointment of examiners is necessary to enforce the guarantees of the Fifteenth Amendment, or

2. He has received twenty meritorious complaints alleging voter discrimination.

At present, Federal Examiners have been assigned to the following Louisiana Parishes:

Plaquemines
East Feliciana
West Feliciana
Quachita
East Carroll

Citizens who allege that they have been denied the right to vote on account of race or color may file a written complaint with the Attorney General, Department of Justice, Washington, D.C. (send a copy to the Commission on Civil Rights).

Protection of Voters and Voter Registration Workers

The Voting Rights Act extends civil and criminal protection to qualified persons seeking to vote and to those who urge or aid others to vote. Public officials or private citizens who attempt to or intimidates, threatens, or coerces a person from registering or voting are subject to criminal penalties. It is also a crime to attempt to or to intimidate, threaten or coerce anyone who urges or aids any person to register or vote. Complaints of intimidation or threats should be sent in writing to the Attorney General, Department of Justice, Washington, D. C. (a copy to the Commission on Civil Rights).

3 Old Guard Democrats Are Challenged—Turnout by Negroes Is a Factor

VOTING

By BEN A. FRANKLIN

Special to The New York Times

RICHMOND, July 12—Nearly half a million Virginians, a record number, voted today in the Democratic primary.

The large turnout, including the participation of what may prove to be a record number of new Negro voters, was essential to the hopes of three moderate-to-liberal candidates who are challenging the state's best-known members of the political organization of former Senator Harry F. Byrd Sr.

The turnout was heaviest today in the Norfolk area and in some sections of the northern Virginia suburbs of Washington, where more persons had voted by midday than voted in the gubernatorial election last November. The statewide vote then was 562,789. The previous record vote in a Democratic primary here was about 353,000 in the gubernatorial race of 1961.

Negro Vote Is Lighter

Negroes here in Richmond apparently did not vote as heavily today as in the City Council election three weeks ago when three Negroes were elected to the council.

Nomination in the Democratic primary in Virginia, despite a resurgence of Republican party activity, is still generally regarded as certain to assure election. The crucial Democratic races were the following:

¶United States Senator A. Willis Robertson of Lexington, 79 years old, faced a threat, unmatched in his 34-year career as a Representative and Senator, from William B. Spong Jr., 45, a moderate lawyer and state senator from Portsmouth, in the heavily populated Norfolk-Hampton Roads metropolitan area. The race was regarded as posing the gravest prospect of defeat for an Old Guard incumbent.

¶Harry F. Byrd Jr., 51, the former Senator's son, has been serving an interim appointment to his father's Senate seat since the 79-year-old founder of the Byrd organization retired last November. "Young Harry," as he is known here, faced a less troublesome challenge from Armistead L. Boothe of Alexandria, 58, a moderate, well-known former state senator and unsuccessful "antiorganization" candidate for lieutenant Governor.

¶Representative Howard W. Smith, 83, chairman of the House Rules Committee, was believed to be in the political fight of his life against a young, vigorous and liberal state assemblyman, George C. Rowlings Jr., 44, of Fredericksburg. Mr. Smith's Congressional district has undergone a major reapportionment that drastically altered its formerly rustic character by adding more than 100,000 suburban votes.

Incumbents Are Pressed

These contests focused national attention on the outcome here. The strong bid being made by the moderate challengers has already forced unexpected changes on the incumbent candidates.

Mr. Robertson, chairman of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee, who is an unqualified conservative on fiscal, racial and states' rights issues, has, for example, campaigned primarily on the basis that his Senate seniority would bring more Federal aid to Virginia.

The younger Byrd has publicly taken far more flexible positions on many issues than observers here believe would have been possible before his father's retirement and before Mr. Boothe's sharp challenge to his "dynastic succession."

The family has announced that the elder Byrd lapsed into a terminal coma last week and is expected to die without regaining consciousness, a development expected to generate a "sympathy vote" for the son.

Mr. Smith, who had rarely been required to mount more than a token campaign in his formerly rural district, has campaigned at suburban coffee hours, by riding in parades with pretty girls, and by issuing the first political press releases in his 36 years in Congress.

Key factors in the outcome—unmeasurable until all the returns are in—were the strange alliances formed by many "organization" campaign workers supporting both the younger Mr. Byrd and Mr. Robertson's opponent, Mr. Spong. "Byrd-Spong" campaign efforts were apparent in many areas across the state, presumably to Mr. Robertson's detriment. Mr. Byrd did nothing to dispel this belief.

Even conservative Democrats supporting Mr. Smith in the Eighth Congressional District mailed out a sample ballot that underlined the names "Smith," "Byrd" and "Spong."

Registration Advances 16% in Six Southern States

Special to The New York Times

ATLANTA, Aug. 4—Voter registration in six southern states has increased from 30 per cent of the eligible Negroes to 46 per cent in one year since the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, the Southern Regional Council reported today.

The council, a nonprofit group seeking racial equality, said the results in the first year indicated a need for assignment of more Federal examiners to the South.

Negro registration in Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, South Carolina, Georgia and Virginia was said to have increased from 837,000 to 1,289,000.

Under the act, Federal examiners may be sent under certain conditions into these states as well as into a part of North Carolina to supervise voter registration. The act suspends literacy tests in these areas.

Impact of Examiners

As yet no examiners have been sent to Georgia, Virginia, or to the 26 counties in North Carolina to which the act applied.

Examiners have been certifying voters in 24 counties in Mississippi, 11 in Alabama, two in South Carolina and five in Louisiana.

Through its Voter Education Project, the council reported that the examiners had certified 64,155 persons in Alabama, 41,595 in Mississippi, 13,689 in Louisiana and 4,542 in South Carolina. Almost all of these were Negroes.

There also were substantial increases in registration in these states through local registrars.

Vernon E. Jordan Jr., director of the Voter Education Project, noted a substantial difference between the increases in states with Federal examiners and those without them.

In Georgia, for instance, the increase was 33,949, all through local registrars. In Alabama, Federal examiners certified 64,155 persons and 70,352 more were added by local registrars, a total increase of 134,507.

Mr. Jordan gave the council's analysis of this development: "The figures clearly demonstrate the need for more Federal examiners." This includes parts of the two states to which they have not been sent and many counties in the four states to which they have been sent. There also is a need for more concentrated private efforts to increase registration and voting in the South."

He noted that the foundation-financed Voter Education Project was backing such private efforts over a wide area of the South.

The project's figures for the six states are:

Alabama—248,000 Negroes registered, 51.5 per cent of eligible Negroes, up 134,507 in the past year, of which 64,155 was through Federal examiners.

Georgia—267,000 registered, 43.6 per cent, up 33,949.

Louisiana—243,000 registered, 47.2 per cent, up 89,219, of which 13,689 was through Federal examiners.

Mississippi—139,000 registered, 32.9 per cent, up 113,735, of which 41,595 was through Federal examiners.

South Carolina—187,000 registered, 50.4 per cent, up 44,198, of which 4,542 was through Federal examiners.

Virginia—205,000 registered, 48.7 per cent, up 36,000.

Wilkins Lauds Result

Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said yesterday that the increases in registered voters reported by the Southern Regional Council were "a source of encouragement to those of us who believe that the ballet is an essential instrument for racial advancement."

"This important gain was achieved not by speech-making, sloganeering or demonstrations," he went on, "but by hard work at the precinct level. The unglamorous day-to-day task of getting Negroes to register made this increase possible."

Mr. Wilkins said the N.A.A.C.P. had "contributed mightily to this gain through consistent and persistent work at the grass roots level in all of these states and particularly in Mississippi, Alabama and South Carolina."

"We are firmly convinced," the Negro leader said, "that the continuing increase in Negro registration will bring about a wholesome regeneration and liberalization of Southern politics."

Negro Voter Registration Gains 34,000 in a Year in Georgia

Georgia Negro vote registration figures increased by nearly 34,000 during the first full year of the Voting Rights Act, the Southern Regional Council, Inc., reported here Thursday.

Spokesmen released figures showing that current estimated Negro registration in the state is 267,000, or 43.6 per cent of eligibles. A year ago only 38 per cent of those in the voting age population were registered.

Across the South there were "dramatic increases," Vernon E. Jordan Jr., director of the council's Voter Education Project, said.

Saturday will mark the first anniversary of the act, signed by President Lyndon B. Johnson on Aug. 6, 1965. At this time a year ago, Jordan said, Negro registration in the six Southern states affected by the act was just over 837,000, or less than 30 per cent of the Negro voting-age population.

Now, he said, Negro registration in these states is estimated at 1,289,000, or nearly 46 per cent of the Negro voting-age population. Increases have been most pronounced in four states to which federal examiners have been signed. Alabama registration went from 113,493 to 248,000, to bring in 51.5 per cent of Negroes eligible to vote; Louisiana, from 153,781 to 243,000, or 47.2 per cent now registered; Mississippi, from 25,265 to 139,000, or 32.9 per cent registered, and South Carolina, from 142,802 to 187,000, or 50.4 per cent registered.

No examiners have been assigned in Georgia or Virginia, or in 26 North Carolina counties to which the act applies.

The Georgia Council on Human Relations asked Gov. Carl E. Sanders Wednesday to bring federal voter registrars to the state.

Gov. Sanders

They are needed, the council said, "in the tension areas where the fear of the Negro is so intense that registration is handicapped." A spokesman said the "tension areas" are in southwest Georgia.

Sanders had no comment. He has said Georgia needs no federal registrars.

CIVIL RIGHTS AIDES

The council also recommended that the governor employ a special assistant concerned with civil rights, establish a civil rights division of the state attorney general's office, an end discriminatory practices of the State Patrol and Georgia Bureau of Investigation.

It also pointed out that no Negro sits on the following state boards: Education, Regents, Corrections, Pardons and Paroles, Game and Fish Commission, Veterans Service, Personnel, Industry and Trade, State Medical Examination and State Scholarship Commission.

The council asked Sanders to give special attention to the appropriations of the Welfare Department when drawing up next year's budget.

"We ask that your influence be used to see that appropriations be suggested in order to take advantage of the available federal funds, in seeing that all children of Georgia may not suffer from neglect and hunger. We ask you to use your influence to change the stringent state regulations concerning aid to dependent children," the Council said.

HOUSING STUDY

It also asked Sanders to appoint a bi-racial housing study committee which could bring recommendations to the next governor.

"During the last four years there has been little change in the progress of the Negro citizen of our state.

"Thanks to the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the more fortunate can frequent places of public accommodations," the council said. "However, less than 3 per cent of our children are attending formerly white schools."

U.S. Checking For Pressure In Primary

By MARGARET SHANNON
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON, Sept. 10 — A team of Justice Department attorneys is checking "in various parts of Georgia" for possible intimidation of Negro voters or other irregularities in connnection with the Democratic primary coming up Wednesday.

A Justice spokesman declined Saturday to tell where they are. But the office of a Negro Congressman here named Taliaferro county as one of the places being invesigated.

The attorneys are from the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division. The spokesman declined to name them or to say how many there are.

He said it has not been determined where they will be on duty Wednesday, but the situation is being reviewed.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 10 — A team of Justice Department attorneys is checking "in various parts of Georgia" for possible intimidation of Negro voters or other irregularities in connnection with the Democratic primary coming up Wednesday.

A Justice spokesman declined Saturday to tell where they are. But the office of a Negro Congressman here named Taliaferro county as one of the places being invesigated.

The attorneys are from the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division. The spokesman declined to name them or to say how many there are.

He said it has not been determined where they will be on duty Wednesday, but the situation is being reviewed.

An aide of Rep. Conyers said the Justice Department is requesting Democratic party officials to appoint some Negroes as poll watchers. The Department's attorneys also will be on hand to observe the ballot-counting, the aide said.

The Detroit congressman and Mr. Billingsley met with Mr. Katzenbach Friday afternoon.

The session followed a press conference at which Mr. Billingsley charged that the names of at least three dead persons have been put on the absentee ballot list in Taliaferro.

ONE NEGRO, Calvin Turner, is a candidate for county commission chairman and the county Democratic Executive Committee. Two other Negroes are seeking nomination — one for the county commission and another for the executive committee.

Mr. Billingsley said 950 Negroes are registered. He charged that the number of whites registered exceeds the total white population and that many persons not legally qualified will be voted one way or another.

He said Negro leaders found the names of three dead persons among 244 names on an absentee ballot list and were denied access to a complete list. Officials told the Negroes about 500 absentee ballots would be used, he said.

Taliaferro is in east central Georgia. The county seat is Crawfordville, home of Alexander H. Stephens, vice president of the Confederacy.

South's Negro Voters Nearly Doubled

By RAYMOND M. LAHR

WASHINGTON (UPI)—Negro voter registration has almost doubled in five Deep South states since enactment last year of the voting right act.

The biggest gain has been in Mississippi where a fivefold increase in Negro registration was recorded.

Authoritative reports showed Thursday that total Negro registration in Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana and South Carolina as of Sept. 1 were 1,147,236. This compared with 687,000 when the voter bill was enacted in August, 1965.

The act banned use of literacy tests as a measure of voter qualifications and provided federal supervision in areas where there was evidence of discrimination by state or local registrars against Negroes.

Although Mississippi showed the greatest percentage increase of Negro registrants, it still lagged behind the other four states' over-all totals. Mississippi's Negro population is the largest in proportion to the white populace of any state in the nation.

The Sept. 1 figures, with August, 1965, estimates in parenthesis: Alabama 249,534 (113,000); Georgia 290,865 (233,000); Louisiana 242,391 (163,000); Mississippi 173,826 (35,000); South Carolina 190,610 (143,000).

Although the totals for the five states are almost twice as large as 1965, leaders of Negro registration drives have been disappointed at the figures. They had hoped to register many thousands more.

In spite of the new federal guarantees, some civil rights leaders insist many Negroes are afraid to vote for fear of reprisals from white employers and others.

Primary elections this year indicated the increased Negro registration had little impact on most races. In statewide races in Alabama and Georgia, in fact, a backlash from white majorities hurt Negro-supported candidates.

In Alabama, Gov. George C. Wallace's wife easily won the Democratic gubernatorial nomination over state Atty. Gen. Richmond Flowers, who was backed by Negro groups.

White Voters in 61 Counties Exceed Eligibles, Survey Says

By CHARLES MOORE

The Southern Regional Council, Inc. (SRC) an Atlanta-based rights organizations, has issued a voter registration survey of the South that says 61 Georgia counties have more registered white voters than the number of white persons of voting age in the county.

However, a spot check of six of the 61 counties turned up a set of registration figures differing from those published by the SRC.

Some of the contacted county registrars complained that the SRC not only was using inaccurate registration figures but was comparing them with outdated 1960 census figures.

Marvin Wall, director of research for SRC, said the figures were compiled from a variety of sources — public and private, official and unofficial. The registration figures were several months old, due to a publication cut-off date.

Wall said the purpose of the SRC survey was to get figures on Negro-white voter registration in the South for the summer of 1966, and that the fact that the percentage of white or Negro voters outnumbered those of that age in the counties was only incidental.

Asked if the apparent inaccuracies found in the six counties would cast doubt on the validity of the entire survey, Wall said it wouldn't.

The six counties checked at random by The Atlanta Constitution are Long, McDuffie, Gilmer, Jeff Davis, Walker and Wilkes. The county registrars were contacted about the number of voters registered in the county, and their answers were checked against figures at the secretary of state's office. Both sets of figures were in general agreement.

The SRC survey for Long County gave the white voting age population at 1,527 with 2,225 whites registered, and gave the Negro voting age population at 635 with 1,081 registered to vote.

Long registrar E. S. McGowan, and the secretary of state's office, gave Long County a total of 2,626 voters. "I don't know where they (SRC) got their figures but they're wrong," McGowan said. He added that the Board of Registrars tries to purge the vote list of ineligible voters "pretty often" and "tries to keep it up to date."

In Gilmer County, SRC listed 5,431 voting age whites with 7,997 registered to vote, and seven voting age Negroes and three registered to vote. Registrar L. E. Scharlach said the county had only about 4,500 registered voters, and the secretary of state's office put it at 4,759.

"We have fewer voters now than two years ago," Scharlach said, "when it was just at 5,000. We purge the list every three years, and we will purge it again after the general election this year."

In Walker County, SRC listed 26,511 voting-age whites and 31,415 registered plus 1,388 voting-age Negroes and 1,131 registered to vote. Registrar Otis Wardlaw said Walker had a total of 30,690 voters—about 2,000 less than the SRC said.

Wardlaw also said that any comparison with 1960 population figures would give a wrong result as the county had picked up at least 5,000 persons in the past six years.

In the other three counties:

SRC listed McDuffie with 4,625 voting-age whites with 8,030 registered and 2,740 voting-age Negroes and 931 registered. The secretary of state's office reports the total registration is 5,496.

SRC lists Jeff Davis County with 4,116 voting-age whites with 6,293 whites registered to vote, and 909 voting-age Negroes with 108 registered. The Secretary of State's office gives the total as 6,130.

SRC lists Wilkes County with 3,621 voting-age whites with 4,052 registered to vote, and 3,101 voting-age Negroes with 1,039 registered. Registrar John Haney says the total now is 4,737.

U.S. Observers Give Report —Their List May Grow

11/12/66

By FRED P. GRAHAM

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Nov. 11—The Justice Department reported today that at least 10 Negroes were elected to public office Tuesday in rural areas of the Deep South. With very few exceptions, egroes have not won offices there since Reconstruction.

The figure of ten may not represent al lthe Negroes elected. It was compiled from reports turned in by Federal election observers, who fanned out across rural areas of Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana and Mississippi. No Negroes were elected in South Carolina.

Two cases of physical violence against Negroes were reported—the beating of a Negro election worker in Lowndes County, Ala., by a group of whites and an Amite County, Miss., Negro poll watcher who charged he was struck by a white person.

A department spokesman said these incidents were being investigated, along with scattered reports of irregularities in contests involving Negro candidates.

Turnout Hailed

John Doar, head of the department's Civil Rights Division, described the participation by registered Negroes as "just great."

However, he pointed out that only 47.8 per cent of the Negroes in the Deep South were registered. In August of 1965, when the Voting Rights Act of 1965 went into effect, the figure was 28.6 per cent.

In Macon County, Ala., three Negroes were elected: Lucius Amerson, sheriff; L. A. Lockair, tax collector, and Harold Webb, member of the borad of education.

In Greene County, Ala., the Rev. Peter J. Kirksey defeated a white write-in candidate for a school board post.

A final tally of votes in Hancock County, Ga., which was not completed until last night, showed that James A. Smith had been elected county commissioner and Robert Ingram had won a school board seat. Both are Negroes.

In West Feliciana Parish, La., two Negroes, Raymond Minor and Alvin White, were elected to the school board

Filed Complaint in 1960

Francis Joseph Atlas, who complained to the Civil Rights Commission in 1960 that he had been trying unsuccessfully to register for 10 years, was elected to the school board in East Carroll Parish. The parish has more white voters than Negroes on the rolls.

Robert Lee Williams, the first Negro to be elected to public office in Mississippi since Reconstruction, was elected to the school board in Jefferson County.

A Justice Department spokesman said an investigation was under way into the school board election in Madison Parish, La., where a white write-in candidate, J. D. Fulton, defeated Harrison Brown, a Negro, 1,892 to 1,623.

Out of 514 absentee ballots cast, Mr. Brown got 2. Mr. Fulton got the rest.

WASHINGTON—Justice department officials Friday called the election of at least nine Negroes to county offices in the Deep South Nov. 8 "a milestone" in ending discrimination.

John Doar, assistant U.S. attorney general for civil rights, said Negro involvement in Southern elections was "just great, although we still have a lot to do in voter registration."

The department had sent 571 poll watchers to 27 Deep South counties Tuesday—including 25 ordered to Hancock County, Georgia—but officials said they only received two complaints:

NEGRO STRUCK IN AMITY, MISSISSIPPI

A 53-year-old Negro was assaulted in Lowndes County, Ala., as he waited to pick up an election clerk, and a Negro poll watcher was struck in Amity, Mississippi.

On the other hand, a spokesman said, Negroes won races for sheriff, school board member or county commissioner in nine local elections, and more Negroes voted in the South this year than any time since Reconstruction.

"It was a milestone on the road to putting voting discrimination behind us in this country once and for all," Doar said.

He credited the 1965 Voting Rights Act and increased voter registration drives with "opening the door" to Negro participation in southern elections.

NOTE THESE TRENDS

Justice officials noted these trends:

1. There are more Negro voters registered in the South than ever before—1,500,000 today compared with 687,000 before the Voting Rights Act was passed.

2. Negroes are turning out in force at the polls "where they think they have a choice" but they don't always vote for the Negro candidate if one is running.

"It's much less a racial vote than people think," a spokesman said. Black Panther candidates lost all races against white Democrats, he pointed out. The militant Black Panther party is a creation of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC).

3. Voter, registration drives which have brought out more Negro voters, have also encouraged more whites to vote.

In figures which the department says represent many southern communities total votes cast in Dallas County, Ala., increased from 6,401 in the 1962 primary to 15,717 in Tuesday's ballot.

4. Negroes are being elected to local offices where few of them were even permitted to vote before.

"The pattern was excellent all over," Doar said.

In Hancock County, where ballots were not fully counted until late Thursday, two Negroes who earlier won the Democratic primary, beat write-in campaigns for white candidates for school board and county commissioner by votes of 1,500 to 1,100.

Justice Department observers said there were no incidents, although poll watches were apparently not able to convince local officials to use Negroes as election clerks.

"Nevertheless," said a spokesman, "We received excellent cooperation from everybody involved. There was no tension, no animosity."

Hancock was the first—and only — Georgia county to be placed under federal observaation. The county has 2,300 Negroes registered and 1,611 whites.

11 Negroes in Legislature, Sixth Largest Total in U.S.

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Georgia has more Negroes in its state Legislature than all but five other states, according to a survey published here.

Negro representation in the Georgia Legislature totals 11, topped only by Illinois with 17, Missouri with 13 and Michigan with 12.

Two other states, Pennsylvania and Ohio, were tied with Georgia in the number of Negro legislators.

The Georgia figures represent more than one third of the number of Negro representatives in the South and half the number of Negro state senators.

In all, there are only 23 Negro representatives in the South and half the number of Negro state senators.

In all, there are only 23 Negroes serving in the lower houses of all Southern states, and only four in the Senates.

In the Georgia General Assembly, nine Negro representatives make up 4.3 per cent of the House, and two Negro senators are 3.7 per cent of the upper body.

Negroes make up 28.5 per cent of the total Georgia population.

Throughout the country there are 153 Negroes serving in 27 different state legislatures, the survey reported. In 1960, only 36 Negroes held those positions.

The figures presented herein were accumulated during the summer and late summer of 1966. While they do not represent the final registration figures for the November elections, the difference is not expected to be large. The figures were compiled from a variety of sources---public and private, official and unofficial.

For four states---Arkansas, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia---complete or near-complete county-by-county figures showing white and Negro registration were not available. For these four states, statewide estimates have been made, based on the best information obtainable.

For two states---Florida and Mississippi---figures did not indicate the race of a sizeable number of registrants. These have been divided between the white and Negro columns on the basis of VEP estimates.

Votes And Rights

Estimates by the Southern Regional Council and the Department of Justice indicate that in five deep - South states Negro registration is up about 50 per cent since c o ngressional enactment of the voter registration act of last summer.

This is almost certainly an accurate figure.

It does not reflect any miracle. But it does remind us of the path that must be taken to bring about what is necessary —planning a n d educational training for adults and children alike who are really poor and deprived. It means, too, acceptance of the fact that the segregated system of the past, operating in the face of events and need that long ago revealed the system's moral and human injustices, has created the beginning of what is, economically and socially, a kind of human scrapheap. We must do what we can to make good uses of this "scrap" in restoring it to usefulness rather than leaving it on the heap for further corr sion.

Environment

Voters, aware of the deadening effect of their environment and past, will almost certainly vote for progressive, enlightened government. There are varied and desperate h u m a n problems that can be met only by forthright, costly programs. T h a t some will be wasteful is inevitable. There are, and will be, new plans. There is not an adequate body of trained administrators of necessary innovations in programs. But there will be successes and progress.

Voting increases have not been large. There is an apathy in some areas. This is not unexpected. Persons who do not read and write well, who have never been allowed to participate in the ballot or community discussions of citizenship and community projects, do not readily rush to what is unknown and unfamiliar. This is especially true in those Southern rural areas where coercion and intimidation still exist.

But the ballot is the surest way to reform. Many a tough sheriff and his crew of deputies develop golden hearts in the face of a substantial increase in voters. Many city services, withheld, suddenly become available when the votes are there.

Future Changes

That is why the reported increases are valuable indicators of future changes in Southern attitudes in the area of civil rights. Mississippi shows the largest percentage increase in registrations. In numbers Alabama is highest. (Nowhere is the need for the leavening influence of new Negro voters more critically needed than in Alabama.) The estimates for the five states are as follows:

Alabama — Negro voting registration now estimated at about 228,000, up 116,000 since last August.

Georgia — 248,000, up 17,000.

Mississippi — 122,000, up 87,000.

Louisiana—231,000, up 68,000.

South Carolina — 174,000, up 35,000.

There is need for understanding of the present dilemma in racial planning. The civil rights acts have just begun to produce results. But they will not, and cannot, yet be of any substantial, immediate help to the more deprived rural and slum residents. Statistics of income show us that only about 45,000 nonwhites, for example, last year earned $10,000 and over. This is less than 1 per cent. Statistically, a majority of the nonwhite persons are well below the poverty-line of income—a family income of at least $3,000 per year. (Children, of course, would mean at least $3,500.)

There are the really poor and the really deprived. They are not all Negro, but a heavy majority is. Civil rights laws cannot quickly alleviate their critical needs. Opportunity in jobs, scholarships, education, and other normal objectives presently are largely confined to a rather small — but growing — Negro middle class.

Voting helps accelerate what needs to be done.

REASONS FOR REFUSING TO REGISTER AND OTHER PERTINENT COMMENTS

Wont do any good, the white man will do what he wants to.

Uncle Sam takes care of me, I ain't signing and voting for nothing.

Why should I register and vote? I don't have anything to vote for.

You say putting Negroes in office of government? Ha! They are crooked too.

Negroes get in office, feed their pockets, forget about us that don't have nothing.

They had some Negroes in office, see what they did, all get find jobs, we still have nothing.

I'am not going to register and vote, white man always find a way to get around us Negroes.

Good you think you can help by registering and voting. Let me tell you something, white man don't intend for Negroes to get anything.

Well find you explaining we can help ourselvies by registering and voting, get some of things needed by electing right people. I've been here thirty years (30) and hadn't. Who you say takes us all? Guess I'll go down and register. Way you explain it I feel kinda shame.

You go believing child, won't do any good.

Ha! These people won't stick together. I go register and vote, you you know what, some old Uncle Tom go down there and get that white man to change.

Look, we doing fine in Hampton, we get along with white folks, got a place to stay and good jobs, what you want more than that? Ah, I agree we need better housing and sheets. White man give it to us in time.

? streets?

I sure need to register if it helps get higher wages.

Look, white man owns most all these houses if he fix them up, go up on rent, not even fit to live in now. Need to do something about it. You say we can ok, I go register then I'am going to vote. Tired of these old shacks.

You know even that Hampton Institute over there just like all of Hampton, before you get any place you have to have someone higher up. I know for I couldn't get a job, and I know some don't know much as I do got good jobs over there. They know Mr. so and so. And their mother or father went there You can't tell me nothing what can be don in Hampton, nothing I tell you. They put people in good jobs don't even know what they are doing. (You say if we register and vote will change it. Ha! ha! haven't changed all these years and won't. People don't wont it to change)

I'm not registered because something might happen to me and if it does you're not going to take care of my children! — (Mei)

LOUISIANA STATE ADVISORY COMMITTEE
U. S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

YOUR RIGHT TO REGISTER AND VOTE UNDER FEDERAL LAW

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 establishes new protections of the right of registration and voting. In connection with its clearinghouse responsibilities, the Louisiana Advisory Committee to the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights is circulating this memorandum and the enclosed CCR Special Publication No. 4 to provide citizens of Louisiana with a fuller understanding of the new Federal legislation as it relates to state laws covering registration and voting.

The Voting Rights Act

"No voting qualification or prerequisite to voting . . . shall be imposed or applied by any state or political subdivision to deny or abridge the right of any citizen . . . to vote on account of race or color." The following voter requirements are outlawed by the Act:

1. A demonstration of the ability to read, write, understand or interpret any given material.

2. A demonstration of any educational achievement or knowledge of any particular subject.

3. Proof of good moral character.

4. Proof of qualifications through a procedure in which another person (such as an individual already registered) must vouch for the prospective voter.

Requirements of the State of Louisiana

The following state requirements for registration are unchanged by the Federal Voting Rights Act:

1. An Applicant must appear in person before the Registrar of Voters of the Parish and must be 21 years old or older by the time of the next election.

2. He must establish proof of identity and residence (rent receipt or other receipt, charge account, driver's license, etc.--identification must include signature).

3. He must have been a resident of Louisiana for one year, of the Parish for six months, and of the precinct for three months (or of the municipality for four months for municipal elections) by the time of the next election.

4. He must be a citizen of the United States and have not been convicted of a disqualifying crime (unless full pardon and restoration of franchise has been granted).

INSIDE REPORT

. . . by Rowland Evans and Robert Novak

WASHINGTON

THE CURRENT turmoil which has brought South Viet Nam to the brink of civil war and endangered the war against the Communists is, ironically, the result of a mad rush by Vietnamese politicians to position themselves for free elections.

Indeed, secret information available to U. S. officials shows that the origin of the turmoil can be traced with precision to Jan. 5, 1966 when Prime Minister Nguyen Cao Ky first began to talk seriously about a constitutional assembly and eventual elections.

Thus, the root cause of the growing choas in South Viet Nam is not — as the U. S. peace bloc would have it — rising neutralism and a desire to make peace with the Communists. What is happening today can be traced back to Air Marshal Ky's Jan. 15 statement. It is a story worth telling.

Less than a month after Ky's statement pointed the way toward genuine political and governmental changes within South Viet Nam, the militant Buddhists headed by mystical, enigmatic Thich Tri Quang began secretly to plan for future elections.

Tri Quang's plan was somewhat similar to the political organizing of, say, a Democratic big-city boss in preparation for a presidential elecion in the U.S.A. If an election were really going to be held in South Viet Nam, the agile, ambitious Tri Quang wanted his agents to be ready for it.

Things to do

THIS MEANT many things had to be done. It was necessary, for example, to set up an organization — nothing so precise as the political organization in the precincts of an American city, but a political organization in rudientary form.

Militant Buddhists who follow Tri Quang had to be assigned specific political chores, taught how to promote candidates and conduct a campaign.

A blueprint complete to the last detail, drawn up in January, has been studied by U. S. officials and conclusively demonstrates that Tri Quang's political agitation pre-dated President Johnson's celebrated meeting with Ky at Honolulu Feb. 6.

This should partially lay to rest the myth that President Johnson is personally responsible for the political crisis because he put his arm around Ky at Honolulu.

But if Tri Quang was organizing a disciplined core of student-politicians as long ago as January, Ky's conduct after the Honolulu conference unquestionably added fuel to the political agitation.

The Johnson administraton had hoped that, when Ky returned to Saigon after Honolulu, and later pushed by the Buddhists, announced a specific date for the election of a constitutional assembly, he would close his eyes to pressure tactics by the Buddhist militants in central Viet Nam, centered in Da Nang and Hue.

The hope was that Gen. Ky could concentrate on the war, and most important, on talking up the election—and let the militant Buddhists stir up a little trouble without retaliation.

INSTEAD, buoyed by his meeting with the President and alarmed at Buddhist agitation in the northern First Corps area, Ky fired Buddhist-backed Gen. Thi, First Corps commander. Ever since, the political battle has steadily escalated.

The discovery of electioneering plans drawn up in January illustrates one hard fact: feuding political forces in South Viet Nam are preparing in dead seriousness for an election this September. The activities of Tri Quang should be judged more in that light than as an effort either to bring down the Ky government or undermine the U. S. military effort.

This political zeal, despite its hazards, poses opportunities for the long-term U. S. interest. Each of the hostile, feuding factions in South Viet Nam — the Buddhists, split into many groupings, the Catholics, the religious sects, the military — are worried about getting left at the gate when the election is held. They all want a piece of the political pie that will result from that election.

It was an understanding of this fact that led President Johnson to murmur to Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, just before Lodge returned to Saigon: the proper role of politics is to include and not exclude."

The basic reason for all the agitation in South Viet Nam is that everyone wants to be included. — (c)

Johnson Cautious On Hanoi Response

By RICHARD EDER

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON—President Lyndon B. Johnson said Thursday that Ambassador Arthur Goldberg's Viet Nam peace proposals to the U.N. General Assembly had been made with his "full approval," but the administration appeared cautious about expecting any favorable response from North Viet Nam.

Senatorial critics of the administration's Viet Nam policy, however, were enthusiastic in their praise of the speech.

Asked by a newsman whether Goldberg's speech was "an important new initiative," Johnson avoided any such description. He said only that he had read the speech and approved of it.

"I think it is good for him to say it," the President said, adding:

"We are very anxious, as you well know, to do anything and everything we can through every forum we can, to try to promote peace in the world. I think that is what he is trying to do. He has my full approval and the secretary of State's approval."

The President's reaction was reflected in the public statements of other officials here.

Sen. J. W. Fulbright, D-Ark., chairman of the Foreign Relations committee, said that "this approach is in the right direction" and "in the spirit of compromise."

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, D-Mont., who has urged more active administration efforts for peace, called it "a good first step on the part of this county." He said he hoped North Viet Nam would see in it evidence "that this government is flexible regarding any basis for talk leading to a settlement."

Presidential assistant Walt W. Rostow contributed to the White House's cautious tone by saying that there was no evidence that Hanoi would accept the proposal for military de-escalation made by Goldberg.

Troops Take Control Over Leopoldville

LEOPOLDVILLE, The Congo (AP)—Congolese troops took over strategic points in Leopoldville Sunday under a military plan to prevent unrest.

Radio Leopoldville announced authorities had decided to enforce the plan after an explosion late Saturday of three small charges of plastic explosives in public places.

One charge caused a minor explosion in front of a restaurant in Kalina. The second shook the city's deserted central market. The third was on Cabu Bridge, near where four alleged plotters against the government were hanged Thursday.

Facts Help to Explain Medicare Misunderstanding

By SYLVIA PORTER
New York Financial Columnist

A majority of U.S. citizens aged 65 or over today are functionally illiterate. English is a second language for nearly one in four of our elderly. Of citizens 65 or older, one in three has a yearly income of less than $1,500. For three out of four, Social Security benefits—averaging less than $1,000 a year for a retired individual—are the key sources of income.

Sylvia Porter

These chilling facts help explain why there is such gross misunderstanding and ignorance of how Medicare's $3 a month voluntary doctor insurance plan will work—and why so many millions of Social Security beneficiaries have failed to sign up for the plan.

Of 16 million doctor insurance application cards mailed by the Social Security Administration last September and October, only about 11 million have been returned and only about 10.1 million of those who returned the application signed up. Social Security is now in the midst of a second mass mailing to those who haven't responded or who turned down the offer. It also has appealed to 1.2 million others not now receiving Social Security benefits who are eligible to sign up for the doctor insurance.

In addition, Social Security offices throughout the nation are holding intensive neighborhood meetings in schools, churches, community centers to explain the program and to sign up the elderly.

The Office of Economic Opportunity has launched a $2 million 80-city "Operation Medicare Alert," employing more than 5,000 elderly citizens to promote attendance at educational meetings and personally to track down hundreds of thousands of shut-ins.

The U.S. Agriculture Dept. is staging a similar hunt in rural areas, using extension agents, home economists, forest rangers.

Explanations of the plan have been translated into 12 foreign languages and are now being distributed at local meetings and to foreign language newspapers and radio stations.

U.S. corporations and unions are getting in touch with employes and pensioners now 65 or over, to give details of Medicare benefits and to urge enrollment in the voluntary insurance plan.

The Internal Revenue Service has dug through tax records to find others who may be eligible — and welfare offices the nation over are explaining details to the elderly [illegible]elief.

Physicians from coast to coast, at the request of their medical societies, are urging elderly patients to sign up for the voluntary Medicare insurance.

It's the most massive "sales drive" for Social Security since the original act went on the books a generation ago, but the fact is that the Medicare doctor insurance plan is a bargain to the elderly. It's estimated that the entire Medicare package of hospital and voluntary doctor insurance is worth $216 a year to the individual. Yet he pays nothing for the hospital part of the plan and just $36 a year for the doctor insurance. The federal government is contributing a matching $36 a year.

In instances where even the $3 a month is prohibitively expensive to the eligible recipient, a growing number of local welfare offices and private employers are offering to take over the cost.

For the elderly who today cannot afford major medical insurance coverage, Medicare's combined free hospital insurance and low-cost doctor insurance will provide key financial protection against the terror of astronomical illness expenses.

For those who today have inadequate health insurance, the package will be a substantial help.

For all, it can — and many private insurers are certain it will—become a foundation on which we'll build further health protection through private insurance.—(c1966.)

and

Federal Education Programs

Held At

Allen University, Columbia, South Carolina

February 10-11, 1966

U. S. OFFICE OF EDUCATION

Office of the Disadvantaged and Handicapped

Washington, D. C.

Foreword

One of the major functions of the Office of Education's Office of the Disadvantaged and Handicapped is to coordinate and foster cooperative activities with public and private agencies dealing with the educatinn of the disadvantaged and handicapped. Since the conference is a dynamic and vital mechanism facilitating this objective, the Office has been staging a series of regional conferences throughout the nation which bring together Office of Education specialists and government officials with community leaders.

The first conference on "Leadership Development and Federal Educational Programs" occurred in Washington, D. C., December 1-2, 1965. The second, the subject of this report, was held February 10-11, 1966, at Allen University in Columbia, South Carolina.

Allen University's magnaminous assistance enabled the Office of the Disadvantaged and Handicapped to gather twenty-nine conferees -- community leaders from seven southern States (Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee), for a searching appraisal of ways community resources could be blended with Federal programs to improve the educational position of the disadvantaged and handicapped.

Considered in the simplest terms, the objective of the conference in creatively relating Federal educational programs to community activities was staged in two phases. In the first phase of the conference, Government specialists described the legislative framework directing the various programs with educational policies and procedures. The second part of the conference began when the participants divided themselves into three committees to consider ways local groups could relate specific Federal programs to community activities.

Recommendations that would facilitate closer cooperation were then drawn up. The structure of this report reflects these two phases of the conference. Part I of this report focuses upon the addresses delivered by Government officials, and Part II consists of the conference recommendations. It is hoped that this report captures the scope and tone of the Allen University meeting even though the flavor of vital individual exchanges may not appear.

PART I

WELCOME TO THE CONFERENCE By Dr. Regina Goff

Today, national and local educational concerns converge on Allen University, Columbia, South Carolina, as we meet to focus on "Leadership Development and Federal Educational Programs." This magnificent opportunity for government educational specialists to discuss recent Federal legislation affecting the schools of our nation with community leaders drawn from many cities and towns throughout the south, was graciously extended to us by President B. J. Glover, the faculty staff, and students of Allen University. In the hospitable climate of this University, government officials will describe educational programs established by recent legislation.

The novel and creative features of these programs are apparent. Less apparent, however, are the unfinished tasks which led to the convening of this conference. The ample promises of Federal education programs still remain unfulfilled. Thus, the objectives we set for ourselves in the days to come are the development of realistic approaches to meeting the educational needs which stirred a nation into remedial action. In doing so, we will enhance the personal quality and meaning of our own lives and the lives of children throughout the nation.

The more immediate objectives of this conference are to present information and relevant interpretation of legislation in education enacted by the 88th and 89th Congresses, to invite support of Federal programs currently in operation, and to elicit your creative thinking with reference to programs which you consider consistent with the needs of your local community.

To these ends we shall direct our efforts anticipatory of fruitful returns.

A

WELCOME TO ALLEN UNIVERSITY By Dr. B. J. Glover

Dr.Goff, Educational Specialists, Government officials, and community leaders - on behalf of the faculty staff and student body, it is a pleasure to welcome you to Allen University. The holding of this conference on "Leadership Development and Federal Educational Programs" once again reaffirms this University's openness to today's educational currents. With great appropriateness, the thrust of two main currents of Federal activity -- the War on Poverty and the Great Society -- rest on the keystone of educational programs and policies. The impact of recent legislation upon the schools, colleges, and universities throughout the nation has been prodigious; thus, it is fitting for us to consider today the meaning and purposes of this dynamic activity.

In doing so, we will refresh and rededicate ourselves to the completion of our yet unfinished task -- the building of a society sensitively responsive to the human needs of its people.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS AND THE EDUCATION OF THE DISADVANTAGED

By Mr. R. D. Anderson

It is fitting and timely that the Office of the Disadvantaged and Handicapped sponsor this conference for community leaders who are interested in the affairs and education of economically disadvantaged children. For far too long, educators in South Carolina and throughout the nation have been deeply concerned with the difficulties this easily identifiable group of children has met in school, and the often dismal occupational future that awaited them. The lack of local financial resources, combined with flaws in the educational structure, perpetuated their desperate plight in the past. Today, however, the injection of new Federal economic resources, and a reordering of the school system offer new hope to the educationally disadvantaged. In the past, educational opportunities extended to the disadvantaged were directly tied to local resources and for the most part, local resources were not enough to contend with the particular needs of this group of young people.

The approach of schools to future occupational placement, too, was impeded by the chasm between formal and vocational education, which functioned largely as two self-contained systems. Of these built-in inadequacies were, of course, the culturally deprived. The hardline States' rights position vis-a-vis Federal aid to education began to give way when financial strains became apparent, and the public recognized that children with potential and undeveloped careers were the chief sufferers.

The passage of the Vocational Education Act of 1963 with the resulting success of the program, and the creative possibilities open to the schools under Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 demonstrated the feasibility of State-Federal cooperation. The Vocational Education and the Elementary and Secondary Education Acts also enable the local school system to foster new opp ortunities for developing cooperative academic and vocational programs that when synchronized, articulated, and blended will show promise of bridging the gulf between formal and vocational programs that will redound to the benefit of all children, especially the disadvantaged.

These few observations barely scratch the surface of the schools' relation to the education of the disadvantaged and the role recent legislation can play in removing inequities in our school systems today. You are presented with the challenge of introducing new insights and approaches for establishing programs that will benefit under current legislation disadvantaged children and improve the educational opportunities of all young people.

THE EDUCATIONAL IMPLICATIONS OF THE ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY ACT OF 1964

By Mr. Emanual Reiser

It is a pleasure to meet and discuss with you various Federal programs of assistance to the poor in your local areas. The primary concern of the Office of the Disadvantaged and Handicapped is the coordination of all educational programs, and eventually all Federal programs that relate to education for the disadvantaged and handicapped.

The proliferation of Federal legislation over the past few years has made it extremely difficult for large cities to keep attuned to the various programs. In fact many communities now have representatives in Washington whose sole purpose is to advise the local authorities on current programs and those under consideration by the Congress of the United States.

This conference has two primary purposes: One, to inform you about the various programs available for possible use in your communities; two, to learn of your problems and to devise solutions and ideas that can be forwarded through our Assistant Commissioner, Dr. Regina Goff, to the Commissioner of Education for possible future legislative action to meet the educational needs of the poor.

The packets of materials you received in advance of this meeting include explanations of Federal Legislation in the field of education, welfare, and manpower training which can be read over the next few weeks.

I am going to review the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, not so much in terms of the actual legislation (copy in your folder) but in terms of impressions I have gathered the past two years while reviewing educational components of Community Action Programs, and both giving and receiving advice and counsel from interested citizens at all levels of government, religious organizations and non-profit institutions.

My primary aim is to evoke discussion, so I am hopeful that much of what is said will stimulate you to think about solutions to problems.

Title I, Part A of the Economic Opportunity Act provides for the Job Corps camps and training centers for young men and women, age 16-21. The purpose is to give youth an opportunity to learn work skills and motivation to become productive citizens.

D

Title I, Part B, the Work Training Program, provides useful work experience opportunities for in- and out-of-school youth. This is the Neighborhood Youth Corps.

Title I, Part C, the Work Study Program, recently transferred to OE, provides part-time employment for students in institutions of higher education in need of earnings to pursue their education. Originally, this legislation gave preference to students who would work in the Community Action Program. As of last year, however, there were too few nearby community action programs, thus many of the students worked in college campus programs to earn the additional sums of money that would enable them to continue their college education.

Title II-A, the heart of the Economic Opportunity Act, sponsors community action programs, which some of you represent. It is my conviction that unless the total community is organized to focus upon the total problems of families, none of the problems of poverty will be solved, and billions of dollars will be wasted. For example, an ADC mother who has five children, whose husband is absent or works part-time, with children in need of medical attention and with insufficent funds to meet rental payments, cannot be concerned about one of her children who is dropping out of school. OEO funded over a million dollar research project with the Vocational Rehabilitation Administration through the Georgia State Department of Education, specifically to concentrate on a thousand poor families, taking all members through a pre-guidance and evaluation program, funneling them out over a three-year period to the appropriate local agencies and government programs.

Title II-B, The Adult Basic Education Program which also has been delegated to the Office of Education by OEO, has a two-fold purpose, that of teaching people to read and write, and informing them of their rights, so that they can obtain necessities due them as human beings in a community.

Adult basic education has been funded under four different Federal programs. Some programs are funded under Title II-B through the State departments of education but to date, funds have not been sufficient in many instances to reach the target populations.

Under Title V, delegated to the Welfare Administration, there are both work experience training, and adult literacy training programs, for people who are on, or about to go on relief. Approximately $111 million was spent last year on 88,000 people for vocational training in the school systems, or on-the-job training, or basic literacy training.

There is also the possibility of literacy training under the Manpower Development and Training Act (MDTA). Under this act, there is a maximum two-year training program which includes literacy training. In addition, some programs have been funded under Title II-A of the Community Action Program, when funds under Title II-B were not sufficient to train all program applicants.

Now, I would like to talk about a special OEO program to combat poverty in rural areas. This is the program of the migrant workers who move from farm to farm, in towns and cities, and bring with them their limited educational skills. The Office of Economic Opportunity under the Migrant Branch, has funded at Tuskegee Institute in Alabama one of the first Adult Education Programs with stipends for seasonally employed workers to attend classes. Among the poor in the south in many farm areas, almost everybody is under-employed. Working is a 40-50-60-day-per-year proposition. The Migrant Branch is looking for programs for the hard-core unemployed, or under-employed farm worker. An educational program will be entertained in the field of educational literacy, language arts, home economics, consumer education, vocational preparation, vocational training, etc. "The Migrant Farm Workers and the Economic Opportunity Act" explains the kind of programs eligible for funding and who to contact.

I suggest you apply through the Atlanta Regional Office to the Migrant Branch of the Office of Economic Opportunity in Washington. The fine part of this program is that stipends are provided to people to attend school to learn how to read and write, so that they may leave the unemployed stream.

The President had a committee that reported on the whole question of poverty. One of the items that the Committee advocated was the negative income tax for the poor. It has been a debatable issue for a long time; the committee was of the opinion that poor people cannot be motivated until their basic needs for food, shelter, and clothing are satisfied. Milton Freedman, who was the Economic Advisor of the Goldwater campaign, a conservative economist, recommended the negative income tax during the 1964 campaign. There are recommendations of this sort all the time, and the pressure is strong from big business, from labor unions, from school organizations, to place a floor beneath poor people for food, shelter, and clothing.

Today, welfare programs do this in a limited, haphazard way. Within the next five years perhaps a program will provide each family a minimum allowance so that fundamental needs are met, and then children can be motivated to begin to look beyond their basic needs to education.

Last July, the Joint OE-OEO Unit approved an educational program for Texas where 1,000 migrant workers were removed from the migrant stream and given stipends for vocational training. It was a three million dollar program approved in cooperation with the State of Texas.

Last January, the Unit recommended to the Commissioner of Education that at age 16 when dropouts occur most frequently, $40 a month be given to children from impoverished families to meet hidden school costs. The average poor family does not recognize the hidden school costs. But clothes, class dues, college application fees, etc. escalate hidden school costs to $400-$500 per year. An amazing number of promising students drop out because of these expenses. These are the kind of fundamental human issues that are involved in education and poverty that I hope will be discussed during later conference sessions.

HIGHER EDUCATION

By Dr. A. W. Boldt

I am Ben Boldt with the Bureau of Higher Education in the Atlanta Regional Office of the U. S. Office of Education. Our office covers the six southeastern States. I am to speak to you on the Higher Education Programs and I will add some of the problems in relation to implementing the program. The Dean of this college and the President have written me on many occasions saying that Allen University, in the midst of a great southern State, has historically taken interest in and done much good for disadvantaged youth. However, they say "we can't get funds to build it up and therefore, we cannot get accredited. Here are all of these programs. Why can't Allen University become a part of the great movement?" We at the Office of Education or I should say, those who write legislation sometimes write imponderables and impossibilities into a bill. For example, legislation requires the college must be accredited for five years in order to get certain kinds of funds. Well, how do you get accredited? Title III which refers to emerging colleges and universities, is going to be our answer for schools of the type of Allen, schools which are struggling toward accreditation. We have a lot of them in the United States. I think sometimes we get a little hep, if I may use the slang expression, on accreditation rather than on human beings.

Let's look at another example. The boys and girls who take work-study money and loan money which gives them a chance for college do not understand after going to school why they find themselves with only a second-rate diploma from a non-accredited college. I think it is incumbent upon the people to make known situations and incumbent upon the writers of legislation to be realistic in terms of conditions.

We are today a great nation but a good many years ago when we had a population of 76 million, only four per cent of college-age students were in college. Today, we are at a point where we have 40 per cent of students in college and 71 per cent getting their high school diplomas. We have 125 thousand schools, 100,000 administrators, two million teachers, and spend 42 billion dollars a year. When the President asked for billions of dollars for education he was not asking the impossible. Now, I was reading the Wall Street Journal in which it stated that General Motors made millions of dollars in profit after all of the costs were paid.

If General Motors can do this in selling cars, I think it is important that we invest in what is really basic in any country and that is its people. Looking again at the legislation you may not always agree with what is written but those who write the regulations do so with you in mind. However, your own ideas can help write regulations. I think that is one fine thing about this meeting, and what you're going to get out of a meeting such as this. That is, you can say to me, "look Dr. Boldt, we just don't like that provision because you're not reaching our people," and Dr. Goff, "your program ought to take the message back to Washington."

A lot of questions come up especially questions on State plans. A big problem is a lot of States are slow in acting, then the people get impatient and they want the Federal Government to dip in and do something. I was talking to some people the other day and I said, "well, the Federal Government can't do this." You're talking about State plans you have to move State people. Now the Bill says that public and private non-profit schools should benefit from education funds. Some parochial schools are getting impatient. They say they're discriminated against in their rights to the advantages of this law, and they say this because the States are so slow in acting or do not act at all in getting programs going. I can't give them all the answers, but I do know that in all my six States this problem exists. In other words the problem is, disadvantaged youth cannot take advantage of funds available because States refuse to act, or in some cases even if the State does act, local community option in communities prevents programs from getting started. What I'm saying to you is, you will have to go to your communities, start at the grass roots, get public opinion aroused to the point that progress will be made in programs for the disadvantaged.

Now we come to OEO. It seems the Community Action Programs are impotent. The law of the Community Action Programs are impotent. They are not producing anything. They are not developing. In Alabama and Mississippi the Governors have a right to veto Community Action Programs. To get a Community Action Program in the States its just impossible. We have the opportunity now to stand up, say something, to suggest changes in the Act.

But let me say this, the Higher Education Act in my opinion is one of the greatest advances in opportunities for education in this country, and I think the heart of the Higher Education program is Title IV, Student Assistance. Office of Education grants will be distributed to the States on the basis of high school senior and college population. These grants are for needy students who have college potential. If a student needs $400.00 he may get it but the college must match it. If he gets $600.00 the college has to match that $600.00 with its own money either of the scholarship money, a National Defense Loan, or a guaranteed loan money. This is where we are running into trouble in South Carolina. Dr. Whitman, Dean of Students at the University of South Carolina has been going over to the Governors because he can't get South Carolina moving on an agency to handle guaranteed loans. In Tennessee, Florida, and Georgia, they've already acted and they have the agency set up, and are ready to go. As a Federal agent I can't say too much about loans from the National Defense Education Act. However, I am glad that the Senator raised the question. President Johnson said that with guaranteed loans, there wouldn't be need for National Defense Loans. The guaranteed loan is something a student goes out to a bank for and need doesn't enter into a guaranteed loan program.

If you're over 15, if your parents income is over $15,000, they get the insurance discount. The bank, of course, has the right to inquire into the credit risk of anybody it makes a loan to. So, I'm somewhat puzzled as to how our needy students are going to be aided unless we have the National Defense Loan money.

Now, here is something you can do in your communities. Inform high school students. There are a lot of students in high schools who don't even know how you go to college, how you get this money to go to college. They write to me in Atlanta. But then I can't help but think where are these high school counselors who are supposed to tell these students about opportunities to go to college and how you get into college and how you finance the college? In spite of all of our training and all of our money spent, we don't have enough direction. This guidance program has done good, but it hasn't done really good enough in the area that we really need it. Basically, guidance doesn't mean agriculture guidance, it doesn't mean pre-medical science, pre-nursing science. It means you're guiding a youth, you're guiding a person, a human being, a part of our great American Society.

Now I think that and I told them that there is no reason at all why a boy or girl in this country can't go to college. Now I'm not saying college is for everybody. I wouldn't be an honest member of this profession if I felt that way, but those who can succeed and become self-sufficient, should be given the opportunity for advanced schooling.

The film on Higher Education was furnished by the Office of Information and covered the following material:

TITLE I
COMMUNITY SERVICE AND CONTINUING EDUCATION PROGRAMS

Title I authorizes $25 million for fiscal year 1966 and $50 million for each of the fiscal years 1967 and 1968, to assist in the solution of community problems in such areas as housing, poverty, government, recreation, employment, youth opportunities, transportation, health, and land use. States must designate a State agency or institution broadly representative of higher education in the State to administer community service programs developed under this title.

TITLE II
COLLEGE LIBRARY ASSISTANCE AND LIBRARY TRAINING AND RESEARCH

Title II initiates a program to help institutions of higher education acquire library materials needed for their expanded responsibilities in research, teaching, and student use; to encourage new and enlarged college and university training programs to prepare individuals for service in the information sciences and in libraries; to promote research and demonstration projects relating to the improvement of libraries and library and information sciences; and to expand and improve the centralized cataloging service in the Library of Congress. The title is divided into three parts each of which is designed to meet a special need for assistance.

Part A of Title II authorizes $50 million for each of fiscal years 1966-68 for the purchase of library resources.

Part B authorizes $15 million for each of fiscal years 1966-68 for grants to institutions of higher education for training students in librarianship, including the training of communications specialists in the physical and social sciences.

Part C of Title II authorizes $5 million for fiscal 1965, $6,315,000 for fiscal 1966, and $7,700,000 for fiscal 1968 to be used by the Library of Congress for two purposes: (1) to expand and improve the centralized cataloguing service which is already in operation, and (2) to purchase library material from all over the world which would not otherwise be included in the Library of Congress collection and, therefore, not catalogued.

Enclosure to E.

TITLE III

STRENGTHENING DEVELOPING INSTITUTIONS

Title III authorizes $55 million for fiscal year 1966 to assist in raising the academic quality of colleges which have the desire and potential to make a substantial contribution to the higher education resources of the Nation but which for financial and other reasons are struggling for survival and are isolated from the main currents of academic life.

TITLE IV

STUDENT ASSISTANCE

Title IV establishes a program of student financial assistance to make the benefits of higher education available to academically qualified students in need of financial assistance. The title provides four types of assistance:

(1) undergraduate educational opportunity grants;
(2) reduced-interest loans to both undergraduate and graduate students through private lenders, insured by State and nonprofit private loan insurance programs;
(3) an expanded work-study program to provide part-time employment for students, and
(4) improvements in the National Defense Student Loan Program.

TITLE V

TEACHER PROGRAMS

National Teacher Corps

This part of Title V establishes in the Office of Education a National Teacher Corps with an authorization of $36,100,000 for fiscal year 1966, and $64,715,000 for fiscal year 1967. Experienced teachers and teacher-interns who have a bachelor's degree would be enrolled in the Teacher Corps for periods of up to two years.

Fellowships for Teachers

This part of Title V authorizes the Commissioner to award 4,500 fellowships in fiscal year 1966 and 10,000 fellowships in each of fiscal years 1967 and 1968. These fellowships will enable persons pursuing or planning to pursue a career in elementary or secondary education to undertake 2 years of graduate study leading to a master's degree or its equivalent.

TITLE VI

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR ACQUISITION OF LABORATORY AND SPECIAL EQUIPMENT AND MATERIALS FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF UNDERGRADUATE INSTRUCTION

Part A of Title VI makes available to institutions of higher education $35 million for fiscal year 1966, $40 million for fiscal year 1967, and $50 million for fiscal year 1968, for the acquisition of laboratory and other special equipment, including audiovisual materials and equipment and printed materials (other than textbooks) suitable for use in undergraduate instruction in science, mathematics, foreign languages, history, geography, arts, humanities, government, English, or education.

This part also authorizes $2.5 million for fiscal year 1966 and $10 million each for fiscal year 1967 and 1968 to be used by institutions of higher education for the acquisition of television equipment and materials for instruction in the above fields and for minor remodeling necessary for the use of such equipment. An additional $1 million is set aside for administration of the State plans approved under this part.

Part B authorizes $5 million for fiscal year 1966 and for each of the two succeeding fiscal years for the operation of short-term workshops or short-term or regular session institutes for individuals preparing to use educational media equipment in teaching in institutions of higher education or individuals preparing to become specialists in educational media or librarians or other specialists using such media.

TITLE VII

AMENDMENTS TO THE HIGHER EDUCATION FACILITIES ACT OF 1963 (P.L. 88-204)

TITLE VIII--GENERAL PROVISIONS

Federal Control of Education Prohibited

THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT AND PUBLIC EDUCATION

By Mr. Stanley Kruger

One of the most challenging and potentially creative activities in the field of education today is the desegregation of American educational institutions. The Office of Equal Educational Opportunity, under the U.S. Office of Education, deriving its responsibilities from Titles IV and VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, is deeply engaged in assisting educational institutions accomplish this difficult and often dangerous objective.

The two main tools at the office's disposal for the accomplishment of this task are well-developed compliance procedures and the sponsoring of a variety of consultative programs. A discussion of the source and application of these limited instruments will suggest the magnitude of the problem pointing to past successes and future objectives.

The Office of Equal Educational Opportunity has been delegated the responsibility for Title VI compliance activities by the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare for Office of Education programs. We have just entered a new period beginning with a new Secretary of Department of Health, Education and Welfare, and a new commissioner in the Office of Education. Thus, there was a restudy of how Title VI and Title IV functions should be administered, and consideration was given to a central staff unit in the department that would administer Title VI with the related plan, review and compliance activities for all HEW programs.

What does Title VI require? Basically, it says that Federal funds are not to be used in any programs where there is discrimination. And for institutions of higher education as of January 1964, the requirement was absolute. Agencies either submitted to us or to the Commissioner a form certifying that there would be no discrimination in any program involving federal funds. Obviously, the submission of a statement of compliance, Form 441, does not necessarily guarantee that there is no discrimination, but at least the initial statement of assurance by the college or university places the office in a position to proceed from there in terms of an investigation of complaints, and if necessary, negotiations or hearings to resolve any difficulties in the matter. Form 441 is essentially an assurance by the institution that it will not use Federal monies in programs where there is discrimination.

F.

For public elementary and secondary education schools there was a realization that to impose this kind of immediate absolute compliance would probably result in one or two extreme alternatives: either the massive termination of Federal funds to public school systems, or coercion and disruptive measures be adopted in the educational activities of public school institutions. Thus, the public school system in the regulations adopted by the Department, and authorized by the President, were given through basically three options for compliance for this current school year.

The school system can comply by Form 441 which essentially states they will not discriminate in the use of Federal funds for public schools. This is sufficient to say that discrimination will not be in programs where these Federal monies are used. But since the operation of various aspects of school programs are so inter-related the prohibition against discrimination is essentially in all phases of school operation whether Federal monies are directly involved or not. Form 441 submission was one possible means of compliance.

For the most part, the majority of the 25,000 school districts in the United States have complied by submitting or filing Form 441. For example, there are many small school districts where all the children in the district attend the same school. The programs may be inadequate, but at least there is no discrimination on the basis of race, color or national origin. There are other school systems where there are no identifiable minority groups and no discrimination practiced. Most of the school systems in the north and west and in some parts of some States in the south, and in border States, filed these statements of assurance, as a means of complying with Title VI. Those school districts that had a history of dual school systems, where separate schools for Negroes, and Whites, or Indians, existed, were not permitted to merely file the assurance of compliance, but either had to file a court order showing that they were under a final order of a district court of the United States to desegregate their schools, or they had to file what is referred to as a voluntary desegregation plan.

There were a few districts that had a history of dual school systems that had moved so far in eliminating the dual system that they were allowed to submit information showing that this indeed had been done and they were permitted to file a Form 441.

The filing of Form 441 with the Commissioner is an affirmation on the part of the school district that it either does not discriminate or if it still has traces of a segregated school system, that it will take certain steps to eliminate these traces. In many cases there has been little or no desegregation to date. In any case, the plan for desegregation and the court order to desegregate the school system obviously are first steps toward the elimination of discriminatory practices in the operation of these schools. There are many ways in which discrimination may occur aside from merely the assignment of pupils or faculty to one school or another on the basis of race, color or national origin. But at least this is for many southern districts the most open, most apparent, most blatent form of discrimination, and it is the one on which there is an initial attack being made at this time.

The ultimate weapon of the Office of Education in the application of Title VI is the termination of Federal money under any OE program (Elementary and Secondary Education Act, Higher Education Act, Vocational Education Act, impacted area monies, and anything else that we might administer).

There is a prescribed series of steps that must be taken before this termination can come about. Basically, there must be some evidence that discrimination in the case of Form 441 districts is being practiced, or in the case of plan district or court order districts there must be some evidence that they are not complying with the plan or with a court order.

The second step in the case of violations is a phase in which we must try by negotiation to resolve whatever conflict between practice and plan may exist. And if this fails, and only then, we must present the evidence we've obtained to a hearing examiner. The hearing examination in a sense is a kind of legal court action, except it is within the department, and it is more of an administrative action than a judicial one. The findings of the hearing examiner then are reviewed by the commissioner and by the secretary, and if they approve termination of Federal funds then the appropriate committees in the House and Senate are notified.

The Office of Education must wait 30 days before termination of funds occurs. This is a long process but I think it is designed so that administrators in the office or other Federal agencies cannot precipitously terminate money, using their own administrative power to turn off and on the faucet of Federal funds. At this point, the Office of Education and the inter-department has held hearings on approximately 80 or 85 school systems.

Basically, these are school districts that have not submitted any form or any assurance of compliance with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act. The next group of schools for which hearings have already been recommended are districts that submitted assurances, but are obviously not living up to them.

There is a parallel action related to Title VI that I would like to discuss. In addition to the termination of Federal funds by the Office of Education, there is also the possibility of Justice Department action (under the later sections in Title IV of the Civil Rights Act) to enter into suit as a party to a suit already begun, or enter into suit upon receipt of complaint, and through the judiciary to bring pressure to force desegregational schools.

There are these two major channels of remedial action toward public school desegregation: Justice Department action , and Office of Education action on terminating funds. In addition to these procedures, of course, any citizen or anyone who has legal standing can bring suit, as has been done in the past -- with or without the support of Civil Rights groups to force school desegregation.

In the administration of Title VI, major complaints stem from two directions. Civil Rights groups and related interested citizens, many of whom are educators and feel that Title VI activities move much too slow and that the office has not been forceful enough in the administration of its obligations and duties under Title VI. On the other hand, local school administrators and school boards usually complain that we move too rapidly and are requiring too much, and that the office may upset the educational system, and that people's attitudes must be changed gradually.

The office functions some place between these two extremes, I am sure, and satisfies neither, I suspect.

It is presumed by the Civil Rights Act that schools will be desegregated. We have no problem with this point of view. And I think that we have no disagreement between ourselves or those who would urge us toward greater action or those who would urge us to go slowly. Neither of these groups are arguing that there should be no school desegregation. There may be isolated individuals who still hold this viewpoint but the combination of the Supreme Court decision of 1954 and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 pretty well remove any argument from rational people anywhere, that it is not the will and intent of the American people to let schools be segregated.

The question now is more one of pace than of 'to be' or 'not to be.' In Title VI the Congress said that there should be no discrimination. When regulations were issued, however, in respect to public schools, forms of gradualism were permitted. Congress recognized that there would be difficulties when public schools desegregated. These difficulties are referred to in Title IV as special educational problems incident to desegregation, or special educational problems occasioned by desegregation.

We have generally taken a very broad interpretation, saying that an impingement upon any phase of the operation of the public school system, or if there are implications in desegregation for any phase of operation in public schools, then this is a special educational problem occasioned by desegregation. For example, the redesign of bus routes to eliminate separated routes for Negro children and White children, is an educational problem related to desegregation.

The use of school buildings, the elimination of substandard buildings, particularly where these have been assigned to children of one race, is an educational problem related to desegregation.

The modification of curriculum so that social study courses include to a much greater extent some topics that provide children with an awareness of contribution to the American system of various minority groups is an educational problem related to desegregation.

The use of different kinds and different approaches in instructional methodology so that children who have been denied adequate educational experiences because of segregated school facilities and programs, enabling these children to catch up, is an educational problem related to desegregation.

Beyond these considerations we also are concerned with community problems, particularly an understanding in the community of the need for and the benefit of what some people refer to as quality integrated education.

Through Title IV, Congress has provided assistance, and basically, there are two forms of assistance that we administer. Under Title IV we can provide consultant help from our own staff, or from a roster of consultants that we have employed to school systems. These are specialists in various fields of endeavor from colleges and universities and social agencies who are available without cost to the districts to provide consultant advice in the solution of any of the broad range of educational problems related to desegregation.

Secondly, we sponsor institutes for teacher training at colleges and universities on problems of desegregation. Some of these institutes are almost strictly concerned with the curriculum and instructional adductations that have to be made in what is referred to as the multi-cultural school. Other institutes deal very directly with questions of bias and prejudice in human relations. Still other institutes deal with management aspects for school administrators in dealing with problems of newly desegregated schools. For example, handling possible extra curricular activities in the initial phases of desegregation.

Some institutes are almost strictly informational. They provide data to superintendents and board members and attorneys concerning what is required to obtain compliance. In addition to the act and the regulations of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare there is also a set of what is referred to as the Commissioner's Guidelines, which must be used to develop the voluntary desegregation plans. When these were issued it was necessary for us to hold regional meetings to inform school administrators the requirements under these various documents.

The Commissioner's guidelines are now being revised and will be reissued shortly and will indicate the requirements necessary for operating public school systems for the next year. We are already planning regional meetings as soon as these regulations are printed and issued so that school administrators can be aware of what they must do for the next school year in terms of further desegregation.

In some cases this means an initial desegregation in order to continue to receive federal funds under an acceptable plan for desegregation.

We have also established what we think is a significant deviation from the usual institute concept. We have some institutes funded in our first year in operation. Our first institute under this program was held at the University of Miami in February of last Year. Since that time we have funded 80 institute programs. The first grant to school boards was also funded a year ago in February and this went to Chattanooga, Tennessee, for a program there. Since that time we have had 57 grants to local school boards under another section of Title IV.

Some of the institutes are summer institutes six to eight weeks in length similar to National Defense Education Act (NDEA) institutes. There were 40 last summer.

There are a few institutes which are academic year institutes where participants study full time. In addition, there are about 33 institutes now being conducted on an academic part-time basis. One at the University of Florida is held Monday and Tuesday of each week. There was one at Florida State University for elementary and secondary principals, held on Tuesdays and Wednesdays for one group of principals, and Wednesdays and Thursdays for the other group. Again, there are some that operate every Saturday. We also have two- and three-day short-term conferences. In all of these we have tried to emphasize the need for strengthening and building a continuing relationship between the public school systems and the universities and colleges that held the institutes.

This is done in several ways. We required that there be joint planning in the development of institutes and we have also required what we refer to as follow-up activity. For example, after a summer session institute, the staff of that institute must continue to work in the following school year with the participants of the institute in their school districts so that continuing support for the participants is provided as they try out some of the ideas they gained in the institutes.

A little realism is brought to the ivory tower of the campus by getting the professors out in the classroom situation where participants have a chance to air the actual problems that are involved.

Committees' Recommendations

WORKSHOP A: Committee on OEO Community Action Programs and the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

Recommendations:

1. That stronger emphasis should be placed on selecting staff to be involved in the successful operation of any OEO program. In too many instances wherever Federal programs are in operation, reasons for doubting competence have been much in evidence.

2. That successful poverty programs under Federal sponsorship should require the involvement of:

   a. Organizations that have a history of concern for students with special needs.

   b. Representatives from target areas having a role in the development of local programs.

   c. Leaders from civil rights organizations taking a vital part.

3. That a period of orientation should be provided for all staff personnel prior to job assignment. In too many instances OEO staff members seemingly are not well acquainted with the responsibilities of the job.

4. That in the event it is impossible to interest an establishment in organizing community programs, then segments of, rather than entire cities, should be funded.

5. That the availability of Federal programs should be made known in all forms of media. This function cannot be left to newspapers and a few publications alone.

6. That greater assistance to communities should be given by the regional offices. For example, the regional offices could extend their services to include aiding communities in filling out the many project forms necessary for Federal funding. This could be referred to as a technical advisory team.

7. That a Family Corps should be established and expanded as rapidly as possible since many basic problems related to school and community result from disorganized family patterns.

WORKSHOP B: Committee on Vocational Education Act and the Manpower Development and Training Act

Recommendations:

1. Since the families of young people and schools are often unaware of the effect that preparation for the world of work has on young people, the above committee recommends that there be established a comprehensive and pervasive vocational program with ancillary services for disorganized families in any Federal assistance programs to schools.

2. Vocational education programs are skill-oriented, but fail to emphasize honesty, dependability and traits related to leadership. As a result, many people coming out of training programs are good only for temporary work. Programs should include motivation techniques and involve parents in some manner.

WORKSHOP C: Committee on Civil Rights Act and the Higher Education Act of 1965

Recommendations:

1. That more voluntary assistance should be given to subprofessional groups.

2. That financial aid officers in colleges should work more directly with poor students. (These students have a tendency to over- or understate their financial needs.)

3. That the channeling of displaced teachers into retraining programs should be emphasized and implemented through use of Federal funds.

Welfare in South Found Still Biased

WELFARE

AC 2/24/66

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—The U.S. Civil Rights Commission said Wednesday that segregation remains widespread in Southern health and welfare programs assisted by federal funds, and called Project Head Start a "lost opportunity."

The commission report said "most overt forms of segregation such as separate hospital wings and segregated waiting rooms" have been eliminated in the South, but Negroes still face discrimination in many services on the local level.

A few instances of "rapid and complete hospital desegregation" were cited by the commission. One of them was Milledgeville State Hospital in Georgia.

MILLEDGEVILLE PLAN

The report included a copy of the desegregation plan for Georgia's mental institution at Milledgeville.

A majority of children enrolled in Head Start, an Office of Economic Opportunity project to give needy youngsters pre-school training, were found to be in segregated schools with teachers of their own race.

"To the extent that Head Start was a new program in the field of education with an opportunity to demonstrate the possibility of integrated learning situations, its segregated structure in communities visited by the commission staff resulted in lost opportunity," said the report.

In Georgia, the commission found only 21 of 93 Head Start projects integrated—23 per cent.

ASSURANCES FILED

Most local governing agencies had filed assurances of compliance, said the report, but the Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) had no means of knowing whether pledges had been kept.

An assessment by the commission staff revealed wide violation of HEW regulations, said the report.

The commission recommended that HEW proceed immediately to "apply sanctions" under Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Law where programs fail to comply with regulations.

This title authorizes cutting off funds to violators.

Here are some of the findings in Georgia:

1. Milledgeville State Hospital desegregated accommodations and services for 12,000 mental patients and staff assignments and living quarters for 3,000 employes between March and April, 1965.

2. The 484-bed Macon hospital converted its formerly all-Negro building into a facility for welfare patients. Negroes account for 60 to 70 per cent of the welfare patients. No Negro and white patients occupied the same room or ward. In the formerly all-white section of the hospital, there were 56 non-welfare Negro patients, none of whom occupied rooms with whites.

WARDS OPENED UP

3. Laurens County Hospital at Dublin desegregated wards housing welfare patients but had not assigned a Negro and a white patient to the same semi-private room.

4. Laurens County Clinic in Dublin provides service without regard to race. The clinic was desegregated two years before passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act by a health officer who had been administrative head of the Veterans Administration Hospital in Dublin.

5. At the Bibb County Clinic in Macon white women waited for prenatal care in the hallway while Negro women were in the waiting room. Staff desegregation was achieved by alphabetical assignment of desks. Women were served by doctors of their own race, except a Negro physician for the first time examined a white baby last summer.

6. The Baldwin County Health Department at Milledgeville removed the segregation sign from the Negro entrance to its clinic, but Negroes continued to enter through that door only.

Eugene Patterson, editor of The Atlanta Constitution, is vice chairman of the Civil Rights Commission.

Senate Rejects Repeal of Powers

WASHINGTON (AP)—A multi-billion dollar health-education program aimed at the age-old problems of "pain and ignorance" was sent to Congress Tuesday by President Lyndon B. Johnson.

The emphasis was on such things as modernizing obsolete hospitals, providing balanced luncheons for poor school children, a start on serving meals to needy aged, liberalized financial aid to college students, facilities for the group practice of medicine, and an attack on the disease of alcoholism.

FIRST REACTION

First reaction on Capitol Hill included several approving comments, and some critical questions.

Rep. Carl Albert of Oklahoma, House Democratic leader, commended the President for what he called "the next logical step toward our goal of the best possible health and medical care for every man, woman and child in the United States."

Sen. George D. Aiken, R-Vt., called the message "worthy of intensive study" but questioned the making of new recommendations "when the administration is cutting down on the school lunch and school milk programs which have proven to be of such tremendous benefit to national health."

HOSPITALS OBSOLETE

No cost total was placed on the program, but officials said the hospital modernization alone would run into billions of dollars over the years.

Johnson said one-third of the

country's general hospitals, with 260,000 beds, are obsolete, and noted that the need for beds will grow as medical care for the aged begins operating July 1.

He called for a loan-grant program to revitalize such hospitals. High officials said this would involve costs of $6 to $8 billion over 20 years, about 40 per cent of which would be federal money.

On school meals, Johnson stuck to his proposal to cut milk subsidies 79 per cent, on the ground that those who can pay should do so.

Officials said the revamped program would help provide balanced lunches, and in some cases breakfasts, to 1½ million pupils who cannot buy them now. They said some of the emphasis is being shifted away from milk to other foods.

The President had asked $329 million in cash and commodities in his budget for the next fiscal year starting July 1. Tuesday he requested that this be increased by $50 million.

"No child in an affluent America should be without an adequate diet. The new program will move us far toward that goal," he said.

On food for the aged, the President said:

"We now know that among elderly Americans, a poor diet is a root cause of poor health. . . .

"I have directed the secretary of Health, Education and Welfare to initiate a special food service program at multi-purpose centers authorized by the Older Americans Act of 1965.

"Local organizations will be able to offer balanced, nutritious meals to the elderly — without charge or at reduced prices to those who are in need."

To offset the decline in the number of general practitioners, or family doctors, the President urged consideration for a pending bill to provide mortgage insurance for building group practice facilities, such as clinics.

This bill ran into critical questioning at a House hearing Tuesday. It would authorize direct federal loans, where private loan funds are unavailable. Even some legislators who indicated they backed the measure in principle questioned the necessity of direct government loans.

Rep. Thomas L. Ashley, D-Ohio, remarked: "I have never found a situation in which doctors are not regarded as the best possible credit risks." He asked Wilbur J. Cohen, undersecretary of Health, Education and Welfare, whether the average income of U.S. doctors is not about $20,000.

Cohen replied it is probably higher. But he said young doctors trying to get a start, and often in debt for their education, do have trouble borrowing.

Among other things in the lengthy message the President proposed grants to train health workers, more loans for college and university facilities, and an extension of government subsidies of loans to college students.

The President followed the lead of the American Medical Association and other authorities in classifying alcoholism as a disease.

Saying it causes "untold suffering and uncounted waste," he announced that a Federal Advisory Committee on Alcoholism is being created, and a center for research is being set up in the Public Health Service.

The Medicare Plan—I

NYT 3/13/66

Hospital Bills Covered Without Charge—Doctors' Fees to Cost Extra $3 Monthly

By HOWARD A. RUSK, M.D.

Tuesday, March 31, is an all-important day for Americans who are 65 years of age or over. It is the last day on which they can enroll under the voluntary medical insurance program in Medicare without otherwise facing a long delay. If they become ill in the interim they are out of luck.

The Blue Cross and other private plans now held by Medicare beneficiaries are being changed drastically to accommodate the new program.

Medicare is divided into two parts. The first part pays hospital bills and is available without charge starting July 1 of this year to persons over 65 who have applied for Social Security benefits. The applicant is automatically enrolled in the hospital insurance plan.

Virtually all the complementary programs offered by local nonprofit Blue Cross plans include:

¶Provision to pay the $40 deductible required of Medicare beneficiaries who are hospitalized.

¶Provision to pay the $10 a day required of Medicare beneficiaries between the 61st and 90th day of hospitalization.

¶Outpatient benefits beyond the limited diagnostic benefits provided under the hospital benefit section of Medicare.

¶Provision to pay the $20 deductible and 20 per cent of costs incurred by Medicare patients for outpatient diagnostic care.

In addition, many plans are also offering other benefits in their carefully tailored complementary coverage programs. Most significant is the provision for additional days of hospital coverage beyond the 90 days provided by Medicare. Some companion programs also offer coverage for extended care facilities, prescription drugs and hospitalization outside the United States.

Doctors' Services Paid

The second part of Medicare covers the services of physicians and surgeons, up to 100 home health service visits a year even if the patient has not been in the hospital, and sonable" charge. This will mean consideration of customary charges made by physicians and the prevailing rates in the area for similar services.

While a patient is in a hospital or nursing home on physician's orders, drugs furnished by the institution are covered under the hospital insurance part of Medicare. They are not covered, however, when the physician prescribes them and the patient uses them outside the hospital or nursing home.

Everyone who qualifies for the hospital program will receive a health insurance card similar to a department store or other charge plate. Those who sign up for voluntary medical insurance will have a card showing they are participating in both plans.

Certain Fees Excluded

Among the medical bills that the voluntary medical insurance will not pay are fees for routine physical check-ups, routine eye examinatins for glasses, immunization shots and dental care unless bone surgery is involved. It also will not cover the cost of hearing aids, glasses and orthopedic shoes.

Blue Shield plans and other private insurers are adjusting their policies for persons 65 or older so that after July 1 they will pay only for what Medicare does not cover.

Potentially, there are 19 million persons eligible for Medicare. The Social Security Administrator hopes that 80 per cent of those eligible will enroll for medical insurance. By mid-February, more than 13.5 million persons had enrolled.

Approximately 1.1 million persons rejected enrollment initially, but upon second contact approximately half of these had decided to enroll.

In an all-out effort to enroll eligible citizens, the Office of Economic Opportunity has awarded more than $6.8-million in antipoverty funds to finance Operation Medicare Alert in 460 communities. Under these projects, teams of older persons are engaged in door-to-door canvasses to urge eligible per-

The second part of Medicare covers the services of physicians and surgeons, up to 100 home health service visits a year even if the patient has not been in the hospital, and a number of other medical and health services such as diagnostic tests, surgical dressings and splints and the rental of medical equipment.

This program, known as the Supplemental Medical Insurance Program, allows those over age 65 the option of joining by paying a premium of $3 a month. The Federal matching $3 comes from general taxes. This program also becomes effective July 1.

If eligible persons do not sign for medical care benefits by March 31, they will not have the opportunity of doing so until between Oct. 1 and Dec. 31, 1967.

If they wait until then, they will have to pay a higher premium and protection will not begin until six to nine months after enrollment. If they become ill in the meantime, they will have to pay their own bills.

Persons who will reach 65 this year can apply for the medical insurance anytime within three months before their 65th birthday or for three months after their birthday month.

An Automatic Deduction

The $3 monthly premium for the insurance will be deducted automatically from Social Security or railroad retirement checks.

Eligible persons who are not receiving such payments will be notified of their manner of payment.

Like most health insurance policies, the Supplemental Medical Insurance Program has a deductible clause of $50. An individual covered by the plan will pay the first $50 of his medical bills in any calendar year. He must also pay 20 per cent of his total annual medical expenses above the first $50.

Payments for physicians and other services under the program will be carried out by Blue Shield plans and private insurance underwriters under contract with the Social Security Administration.

The 32 Blue Shield plans in the nation will certify 59 per cent of the nation's medical beneficiaries. The rest of the beneficiaries will be certified by private insurance companies.

One-Year Contracts

These designated contractors will be receiving and paying the bills under one-year contracts subject to renewal on satisfactory performance. The contractors will be responsible for determining what is a "reasonable" charge. This will mean consideration of customary charges made by physicians and the prevailing rates in the area for similar services.

While a patient is in a hospital or nursing home on physician's orders, drugs furnished by the institution are covered under the hospital insurance part of Medicare. They are not covered, however, when the physician prescribes them and the patient uses them outside the hospital or nursing home.

Under these projects, teams of older persons are engaged in door-to-door canvasses to urge eligible persons to enroll.

It is interesting and heartening that although the American Medical Association doggedly opposed Medicare, it is now cooperating fully in its administration. Most state and county medical society journals are carrying editorials urging physicians over 65 to enroll in the voluntary medical insurance plan.

E NEW YORK TIMES, TUESDAY, AUGUST 9,

WELFARE GROUPS TO ORGANIZE POOR

Nationwide Drive Designed to Insure Recipients' Rights

By M. S. HANDLER
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 8—A movement to organize the nation's poor into a cohesive social-action force against Federal, state and municipal bureaucracies will be started next month, according to Dr. George A. Wiley, director of the Poverty Action Center in Washington.

Reporting today on the first national meeting held in Chicago over the weekend by more than 100 representatives from 23 cities, Dr. Wiley said the drive would culminate with a nationwide demonstration in January to dramatize the presence of the organized poor as a new force in American public life.

According to official reports there are almost eight million Americans living on public assistance—an increase of 42 per cent since 1950. However, only one out of five Americans classified as poor by the Federal Government receive public assistance.

One of the demands of the new organization, Dr. Wiley said, will be the recognition of the right to represent welfare recipients in dealings with public officials and at hearings as well as recognition of the right to bargain collectively on behalf of recipients.

Dr. Wiley said that one success had already been registered in Chicago's West Side, where the local welfare recipients organization has been recognized by municipal authorities as spokesman for the poor in that neighborhood.

Union Methods Sought

One of the targets of the new movement, according to Dr. Wiley, will be the application of trade union methods, including the payment of dues and the "check-off" system. A legal study, he contended, showed that there was nothing in existing welfare legislation that placed a limitation on how a welfare recipient spent his money.

The organizers of the movement, Dr. Wiley continued, maintain that welfare recipients are denied their right to special allotments, such as clothing and food allowances for children, that they are arbitrarily removed from the relief rolls, and that they are not informed of their full rights under the law.

One principal complaint of welfare recipients, according to Dr. Wiley, is the alleged intrusion on their privacy by welfare case investigators who carry out midnight "raids" to ascertain whether recipients have truthfully reported their condition of life to authorities. The organizers of the movement contend that these searches are a serious violation of a citizen's civil rights.

Costs Are Scored

Dr. Wiley declared that the cost of administering welfare programs through a bureacratic structure far exceeded the money saved through the discovery of persons on the rolls not entitled to welfare payments. He asserted that 20 cents of each welfare dollars went for administering the programs.

Before joining the Poverty Action Center, Dr. Wiley was Associate National Director of the Congress of Racial Equality under James Farmer. Earlier this year, he worked with the Citizens Crusade Against Poverty. Before joining CORE, Dr. Wiley was associate professor of chemistry at Syracuse University, and before that taught at the University of California at Berkeley.

Demonstrations of welfare recipients in 23 cities last June 30 provided the impetus for the movement to organize the poor.

Prof. Richard A. Cloward of Columbia University has become the leading exponent of the idea that the welfare system should be replaced by a guaranteed income for the poor. Such an income would, in his opinion, restore the dignity of poor, remove the stigma of charity, and prevent the demoralization of recipients.

He told the recent conference of the National Urban League in Philadelphia that the welfare system constituted one of the most "brutal and tyrannical aspects of American life" and should be abolished.

Dr. Cloward attended the Chicago meeting but did not press for adoption of his views. Dr. Wiley said the representatives had agreed to limit the movement's first demands to the enforcement of rights of welfare recipients under existing laws.

$144 Welfare Is Enough, Most Board Members Say

A C 9/23/66

By BILL SHIPP

More than half of the county welfare board members in Georgia think $144 a month in aid to families with dependent children is enough, "regardless to the number of children."

More than half also believe that "if a woman with children and no husband" becomes pregnant, she and her children should be cut off the welfare rolls.

And nearly 30 per cent of the board members think that if a woman receiving aid for her children dates she should not continue to get welfare money.

These attitudes were expressed in a survey released Thursday of more than 500 welfare board members in Georgia. The survey was made by the children and youth research department of the state Department of Family and Children Services.

The survey team asked: "In a home where there is no husband, is it wrong for the woman to entertain her date in the home?"

A total of 37.2 per cent of the board members answered "Yes." The rest said "No."

Much of the questionnaire was concerned with "AFDC." This a welfare program which stands for aid to families with dependent children. Under AFDC the state makes cash payments to certain families which include needy children who have only one parent, or have no parent at all, living with them.

Some of the other questions and answers went like this:

"Q. The maximum grant in AFDC is $144 a month regardless of the number of children. Do you think this is enough?"

Fifty-five per cent said yes; the rest no.

"Q. Should AFDC include a policy that allows it to supplement wages of a fulltime working mother with children, who receives a salary that according to Department standards does not meet the family needs and who has no child-care expense?"

Eighty-two per cent said yes.

"Q. Should AFDC grants be pro-rated on the number of children in the family with no set maximum?"

Fifty-four per cent said no.

"Q. If a woman with children and no husband is receiving AFDC and becomes pregnant, should the Welfare department continue to support the children?"

Fifty-three per cent said no.

Five per cent of the board members thought it was all right to hold "children . . . in common jails."

But 98 per cent thought it was a good idea for the Department of Family and Children Services to carry on its program of "supporting children who are needy because of the illness or absence of one or both parents."

The survey team made no comment on its findings.

Judge Directs Negroes Quit Idled School

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — U.S. Dist. Judge Herbert W. Christenberry ordered the Plaquemines Parish school board Thursday to assign 30 Negro children enrolled in the white boycotted Woodlawn School to other parish schools.

No classes have been held at the Woodlawn School since desegregation began in Plaquemines under federal court order two weeks ago.

Every white teacher at Woodlawn resigned when the 30 Negroes enrolled. No replacements have been found.

Judge Christenberry ruled that a choice of schools may be exercised by a parent or guardian.

MEDICARE INSURANCE FOR PEOPLE OVER 65

The new MEDICARE program for persons 65 or over begins July 1, 1966. The Hospital Care program will provide almost free care in the hospital and after you leave the hospital. The kinds of care and the costs that are covered are described more fully below. In addition, there is a Medical Insurance program that will help pay your doctor's bills. (Doctor's bills are a separate cost to you, even while you are in a hospital.) If you want to get this Medical Insurance coverage, you must register by March 31, 1966.

Who must register:

1. For Hospital Care. If you are over 65 and you are not getting Social Security or railroad retirement benefits, register at your nearest Social Security Office. (A list of addresses is enclosed.) If you are 65 or over and you are receiving Social Security or railroad retirement benefits, you will automatically be covered under the Hospital Care program, and you do not need to register. If you are younger than 65 years old, register with your district office as soon as you reach 65.

2. For Medical Insurance. EVERYONE must register separately for this program. You must register for Medical Insurance even if you are covered under the Hospital Care program, and you must register by March 31, 1966.

How to register for Medical Insurance: If you have not yet filled out an application form for Medical Insurance, you should write immediately, before March 31, to the Social Security office nearest you. Say that you want to apply for MEDICARE. Your letter is not the same as the application form, but it lets the Social Security office know that you want to apply for Medical Insurance. They will send you an application form, and you must fill it out and send it back. Even if you cannot send back the application form before March 31, you will still qualify for Medical Insurance if you have sent in your short letter before March 31, 1966. If you do not do this by March 31, you will have to wait a year and a half for another chance to register. You will have to pay a higher premium, and you will have to wait longer before you are actually covered under the Medical Insurance.

In order to qualify for MEDICARE benefits, you do not need to have ever been covered before under Social Security, and you do not have to stop working. But you do need to be registered.

Here is a short description of the two MEDICARE programs:

1. Hospital Care Program

Hospital Care in the Hospital: You pay the first $40 of hospital bills, and the program will pay the rest for 60 days. If you need to be in the hospital more than 60 days, you will then pay $10 a day, and the program will pay the rest for another 30 days. If you leave the hospital and find later that you must return, you will still be covered. If you return to the hospital within 60 days from the time you left, you can receive hospital care up to the full 90 days. If you return to the hospital after 60 days from the time you left, you will again have to pay the first $40 of hospital bills.

Home Health Care after You Have Been in a Hospital: If you have been in a hospital (or a nursing home) for 3 or more days, you may receive 100 free home health care visits any time within one year after you have left the hospital. These visits could provide certain kinds of nursing care, therapy, and other services that will help you recover from your illness.

Outpatient Hospital Services: You are called an "outpatient" when you go to a hospital for certain kinds of services but you do not stay there, just as you might visit a doctor's office. For these outpatient services such as medical examinations and tests, you pay the first $20, and the program pays all other costs for a period of 20 days. After 20 days, you can still receive services but you must pay $20 again.

Extended Care after You Have Been in a Hospital: This part of the program begins on January 1, 1967. If you have been in a hospital for at least 3 days, you may receive 20 days of extended care at a skilled nursing home after you leave the hospital. This service is available to you within 14 days after you leave the hospital. The first 20 days are free. If you need additional care, you will then pay $5 a day and the program will pay the rest for another 80 days.

Services Covered in a Hospital or in a Facility for Extended Care

You do not have to pay anything to register for the Hospital Care program, but you must register if you are not going to be automatically covered (see other side, under "Who must register"). When you become sick and need hospital care, you must pay only the small amounts listed after each type of service (see other side), and the program will pay the rest of the costs for the number of days listed. The program's payments will cover the following kinds of expenses: the cost of your room and board in a semi-private room, ordinary nursing services, the cost of drugs, supplies, and most other kinds of service that hospitals usually provide. The Hospital Care program does not cover the cost of doctor's bills. The Medical Insurance program described below will help you pay for these bills and some other services.

2. Medical Insurance Program

This Medical Insurance program costs you only $3 a month. You must register for this program (see other side).

This program covers 80% of the costs of the three services listed below, but in any year from January 1 to December 31, you must pay the first $50. This $50 may go for any combination of the three services.

Physicians' and Surgeons' Services: Coverage is for all physicians' and surgeons' services that you receive at home, in a hospital or clinic, or at the doctor's office.

Home Health Visits: You may receive up to 100 home health visits each year, under an approved plan. In this part of the program, you do not need to have been in a hospital, and these visits are in addition to the 100 visits you get under the Hospital Care program.

Other Medical and Health Services: The following services are covered, no matter where you receive them: diagnostic tests (X-rays, laboratory services), X-ray or radium treatments, surgical dressings, splints or casts, certain ambulance services, braces, artificial legs, arms, or eyes, rental of medical equipment such as iron lungs, and many other medical items and services.

Unnoted Victims: Vietnam Peasants

WORLD POVERTY NYT 2/15/66 ~~VIETNAM~~

By NEIL SHEEHAN

Special to The New York Times

GIAHUU, South Vietnam, Feb. 14—A massive allied offensive in this area has dramatized one of the major problems of the war—the high price the South Vietnamese peasants are being forced to pay for the death of a few hundred enemy troops and the capture of a few score weapons.

United States and South Vietnamese military spokesmen assert that the three-week-old offensive, aimed at crushing four enemy regiments operating here in Binhdinh Province and the adjacent northern Province of Quangngai, has resulted so far in the killing of 986 Vietcong guerrillas and North Vietnamese regulars and the seizing of 161 weapons.

Some high-ranking American military officials privately expressed doubt over the accuracy of the casualty figures, but it is believed that a few hundred enemy soldiers have been killed

The Saigon military communiqués have failed to mention what is apparent to a visitor to the battlefield—the appalling destruction wrought in Giahuu and about 15 other peasant hamlets on the central coast by artillery barrages and aerial bombardments.

Giahuu and two adjacent hamlets along Highway 1 about 310 miles north of Saigon are a frightening example of this destruction.

South Vietnamese officials estimate that, within the three hamlets, about a thousand mud-and-thatch or brick-and-tile peasant homes have been blasted apart by bombs and shells or incinerated by napalm. Bomb caters, some as large as 10 feet deep and 20 feet across, pockmark rounding rice paddies and hillsides.

This region is noted for its coconut-tree groves, whose coconuts and coconut oil have provided a living for many of the peasants. Now hundreds of coconut trees in Giahuu alone have been snapped in half by high-velocity naval shells from the guns of Seventh Fleet warships.

Although most of the old men, women and children appear to have escaped death or injury by hiding in underground bomb shelters or fleeing to the hills and rice fields,

UNNOTED VICTIM: VIETNAM PEASANT

civilian casualties have still been considerable.

Only two civilians are known to have died in Giahuu, but in the village of Tamquan, two and a half miles south of here, at least a hundred civilians are estimated to have been killed during the fighting late last month.

United States and South Vietnamese military authorities have evacuated 90 seriously wounded civilians from hamlets in the area to the provincial hospital in Quinhon and have treated hundreds of others with light wounds.

Most of the wounds were inflicted by shell and bomb fragments or bullets.

One distraught woman appeared at a field medical station holding a child whose legs had been horribly burned by napalm. The child is not expected to live.

Thousands of refugees—some officials estimate as many as 5,000 — have also flocked to Highway 1 along which many of the South Vietnamese and American troops are concentrated, or to the Government-held district town of Bongson, 15 miles south of here, seeking safety from bombs and shells and emergency provisions of wheat and cooking oil. These have been supplied by the United States aid mission to sustain them until they can return to their wrecked homes and attempt to rebuild.

Toll Perhaps Inevitable

No one here, however, really knows how many homes or coconut groves have been wrecked or how many civilians have been killed, injured or displaced throughout this region. The are has been under enemy control for more than a year now.

Government administration is virtually nonexistent. The primitive communications are either in disrepair or have been destroyed by the enemy.

South Vietnamese and American military and civilian officials have neither the time nor the inclination to make an accurate assessment of the damage.

Most of the destruction a the killing and wounding civilians were, perhaps inev able under the circumstanc The Vietcong and the Nor Vietnamese fought from elaborate system of fortifi bunkers and trenches bu around and within the hamle

Headlong assaults across t open rice paddies would ha inflicted prohibitive casualt on the advancing South Vi namese and American troo so the Communists had to forced to abandon the haml by shellfire and air strikes.

The troops will not rem once the operation ends in few weeks, and local So Vietnamese officials conc that they cannot hope to ma tain control over these haml once the troops are gone.

High-ranking American m tary officials say they cannot afford to commit the limited number of American fighting units to long-range pacification projects because of growing Vietcong strength and the increasing infiltration of North Vietnamese regulars into the the South.

These officials say the best they can do is to attempt to find and maul hard-core Communist units in an effort to relieve some of the pressure on the islands of Government control that remain in the enemy-dominated countryside.

The South Vietnamese Army has adopted a similar strategy. Military officials intend to leave behind only one regiment when the operation ends to reinforce the troops normally stationed in this region.

Qualified military observers believe this regiment will be able to hold only a fraction of the territory that has been fought over.

Thus, when the South Vietnamese paratroopers and the men of the United States First Cavalry Division (Airmobile) depart for some other battlefield in Vietnam, the Vietcong guerrillas and their North Vietnamese allies are expected to return to these hamlets.

They are expected to regain control of the rice fields to sustain tnemselves. They are expected to replace their dead and wounded with young peasants recruited or forcibly conscripted and they will again tax the population to support their military and administrative machine.

'Imperialists' Denounced

Once this is accomplished, they will undoubtedly tell the peasants, as they have already told them in propaganda slogans boldly painted on the walls of the houses here before they departed, that the "American imperialists" murder innocent women and children and wantonly destroy homes and that the South Vietnamese troops are hired mercenaries of the foreigners.

This time, though, returning Communists will be able to point to the ruined houses and to cite the names of the peasant dead and of the injured relatives.

After more than a year of Communist indoctrination, the peasants in this area are already very fearful and suspicious of the American and South Vietnamese troops.

Vietnamese children in friendly villages usually smile and wave at the Americans. But in Tamquan, just south of here, which was the former Communist district headquarters, many of the children do not smile, and they stare silently if questioned.

When an American official attempted to photograph two little girls standing beside the highway, the children began to wail and quiver with fear as he raised the camera. They apparently thought they were going to be killed.

Some of the elderly men and women turn their heads and look away if an American or a South Vietnamese soldier passes nearby. The young men are not in evidence, and they are apparently either hiding or have fled with the Communists.

An American walking through the side streets of Tamquan experiences an eerie feeling.

United States and South Vietnamese aircraft have been dropping leaflets telling the people that the Vietcong are responsible for the destruction because they built their trenches and bunkers within the hamlets.

Government loudspeaker trucks have repeated this message. Government officials are distributing other leaflets praising the Saigon regime and neatly printed brochures complete with photographs of enemy bomb atrocities in the capital.

Such propaganda, in the opinion of some experienced observers, is of questionable influnce in these circumstances unless followed up by long-range indoctrination and concrete deeds to win the peasants support.

Most of these peasants have never been to Saigon. They do not know exactly where it is or who is in power there.

American intelligence officers discovered that the peasants in one village alongside the highway believed Ngo Dinh Diem, who was assassinated in November, 1963, was still the President of South Vietnam.

Except for emergecy rations of wheat and cooking oil and a few hundred bolts of cloth and sewing kits along with rudimentary medical treatment, these peasants have also experienced little from the United States and the Saigon Government except bombs and bullets.

Some Americans here wondered whether the resentment and anger caused by the destruction might not thus create as many new Vietcong as the troops have managed to kill.

"What's the point of telling somebody who has just lost his relatives about a bomb atrocity in Saigon?" one American asked while watching a crowd of peasants assemble in a hamlet for food handouts.

"And how do you explain the unfortunate side effects of war to a peasant whose just seen his house blown up?"

An American visitor asked an old woman in the crowd through an interpreter what had happened to her.

"The planes destroyed my house, and the big guns cut down my coconut trees," she said.

Her mouth, stained reddish brown with the betel nut she chews, twisted as she spoke, and her voice rose into the wail Vietnamese peasant women use when they are describing personal sorrow.

"How many coconut trees did you have?" she was asked.

"Fifty," she replied, "and now 47 of them are gone."

"How will you earn your living now?"

"I don't know," she said.

Visible Travail Of a New Birth

It is a trite thing to say that a new world is being born. But, however commonplace the comment, the travail of birth goes on.

Viet Nam (Southeast Asia), Africa, Central and South America, China and Russia daily remind us that Europe, for many centuries the cockpit of war, the core of international politics and power, and of cultural and scientific forces, no longer fits these roles. Were it not for the dangerous division of Germany and the seeds of war therein, Europe would be even more separated from the unavoidable clash between the world's three major powers.

But this important and ominous struggle is by no means the only visible sign of a new world being born. In addition to the shift in the world's balance of power, the appearance of communism as a world force, and the rift between Russia and China, there is the literal fact of world birth rates.

Problem of People

Dr. Roger Revelle, director of the Center for Population Studies at Harvard University, puts this problem in foreboding perspective in an article, "The Problem of People: Can Man Domesticate Himself." (Autumn issue of "Harvard Today.")

"Hundreds of thousands of years were required to produce, by 1850 A.D., a living population of one billion people," he wrote. "The second billion took 75 years more, from 1850 to 1925, but only another 35 years until 1960 were needed for the third billion. The fourth billion will be here by 1980, and the fifth 10 years later, by 1990.

from the unavoidable clash between the world's three major powers.

The fourth billion will be here by 1980, and the fifth 10 years later, by 1990. (The fifth billion is but 24 years away.) Unless drastic changes in birth or death rates occur, the population increase between now and the year 2,000 WILL BE LARGER THAN THE ENTIRE PRESENT POPULATION OF THE EARTH."

Dr. Revelle's introductory paragraph is, quite literally, evidence of a new world being born. That the rate is much higher in the less developed areas of the world is a fact of ominous foreboding. "In the world as a whole," said Dr. Revelle, "unless a drastic change occurs, people who live in desperate misery and poverty will constitute the overwhelming fraction of the human race."

Explosive Effect

Even we, the richest and most productive nation in the world, cannot escape the pressures of our own increases. We assuredly cannot escape, as we now begin to see, the explosive effect of the pressure-cooker condition of the rest of the world. Our cities, too, keep growing. We have waited much too long to tear down slums and replace them with bold planning of housing and "parks" complexes of schools.

In 1850 we had fewer than 30 million inhabitants. Today we are near 200 million. Our population increases at about 1½ per cent a year. (It slowed a bit in 1965.) Yet, pollution abatement, city water supplies, urban transportation, and slums are desperate, costly problems. There is "a serious decline in the quality of life. Our water no longer tastes as well as it once did. Many of the people in every city waste from one to two hours each day driving to and from work under miserable conditions."

Compared with 1935, food production in many countries has barely kept up with population growths and in many cases has fallen behind. Were it not for food purchases from Western countries, China, India, Pakistan and even Russia would have seriously deficient diets.

The problem of agricultural inefficiency is one which cannot be cured in the brief time of a few years. It will require considerable help from this country and others which, across a long span of years, have developed successful cooperation between science and agriculture production.

A new world is being born. To turn our eyes from it is an act of costly folly.

No Food, Children's Hope Dim

AJ 3/16/66

By CONRAD FINK

NEW DELHI, March 16 (AP)—The tired tip-tap of their hammers sounds through rock quarries. Their quick eyes flit watchfully over herds of cows. Their gay laughter blends with the roar of coastal surf.

These are the children of India, and in their faces is the story of this impoverished nation's cruel economic troubles and its hope of a better tomorrow.

Nowhere is the gulf between reality and dream as clearly portrayed as in young faces.

It is the children among India's 480 millions who show the pinch of malnourishment. Some have scab-covered legs and gummy eyes that betray rampant disease.

But in their laughter lies the hope.

In the state of Kerala, a 7-year-old girl sits under the blazing sun, chipping small rocks into smaller pieces.

Her future is 100 yards away, where old women chip big rocks into small rocks. Her little brother's future is farther up the rock face, where men drill all day, shrouded in choking dust.

A CHILD CHIPS for eight hours like this and still doesn't earn enough to eat as humans should.

In the rock quarries, the young faces don't smile. The eyes don't twinkle. The run slows to a walk. There is no time for fun and games.

But farther north, along the Arabian Sea coast, not even the filth, disease and hunger of a backward fishing village can still the laughter.

Little brown packages of mobile dynamite, bare as the day they were born, charge into the surf, are bowled over and rise laughing to help father land a net.

Here the future looks brighter. It is to ride out to sea alongside the men in narrow, roughhewn fishing boats, learn to placate the storm gods and outwit the devils of the sea.

Children are everywhere in India — on mother's hip, under her feet, crawling in the crude hut's dooryard, scampering down the village pathways.

No one knows for sure how many children are born in India every year. Best estimates are that the population increases 12 million annually.

IN A COUNTRY deficient in almost every necessity of life, how can 12 million new mouths be filled every year? How can enough doctors be trained to care for them? How can schools be constructed?

Education Minister M. C. Chagla announced in Parliament recently that 50 million Indian children are in primary schools.

A fine accomplishment, he said—except that many millions more never have seen the inside of a classroom and never will.

Despite all-out efforts to feed, clothe and educate, the Indian government is falling behind the population growth.

There are more illiterates over the age of 10 in India today than there were a decade ago. American experts put the number at 260 million and say the ranks of the unread are increasing by four million annually.

Thousands of open-air schools have been established in an attempt to give the increasing swarm of children at least the rudiments of an education.

FROM THE MOUNTAINS of Kashmir in the north to the jungles of Kerala State in the south, children can be seen squatting under a shade tree or in a sunny courtyard patiently listening to poorly paid schoolmasters whose "establishment" consists of one portable blackboard.

Even this is beyond the reach of the hundreds of thousands who lead a nomadic existence in desert areas or in the vast slums of India's huge cities.

Many of these children are put to work at an early age, laboring alongside their parents on road projects or in dam construction.

International relief organizations and foreign governments are trying to help India give these children a better start in life.

The children of an open-air school of Mohri village, 100 miles north of New Delhi, proudly show off their "Care" schoolbags.

Increasingly, however, village life is looking second-best to many Indians. City slums are spreading rapidly, luring hundreds of thousands of families away from the villages to a new, but drab, life of rootless street wandering.

Hunger's Shape Is Weird

By CYRIL DUNN
London Observer News Service

NEW DELHI, May 21—Government officials in areas of the Indian state of Orissa, where last year's drought completely destroyed the rice crop, are being accused of neglecting the people put in their care.

Having just motored across the state, I can report that for months now the people have been living on a bare minimum of food and with very little water in a region where thirst rages. Some have died of these hardships; the survival of many more is a miracle of human endurance.

Orissa is and perhaps always has been the land of the thin people. Even in the developed coastal region, from which the Congress party governs the state, more often than not you can see the voters' bones.

The Orissan officials in the state capitol have just been taken sharply to task by Mrs. Indira Gandhi, the Indian prime minister, for doing little or nothing to help their countrymen in the direct need.

IT IS WHEN you have driven westward across the state and then turned south into the wild border regions that you begin to see the weird shapes of hunger.

There are women of no great age, whose skin is drawn so taughtly about their skulls that they wear a constant look of haughty surprise. There are men in their prime, whose visible bone-structure makes it seem as if they have a complete suits of embossed brown armour. And there are children whose bulging and paper-thin stomachs hang from the fragile cage of their ribs and who are apt to cry if you touch them.

Along the line of the road the number of such sights is disturbing, but not appalling. Even in areas marked red for disaster on the drought map of the state, the road is still a strip of relative well-being. But those who should know say the jungle hides the real hunger.

I spoke to an Indian, who is not a government servant, but whose duty takes him along the jungle tracks. He says that some villages up there have been totally deserted by their people. In flight from famine, they crossed the border into the neighboring state of Madhya Pradesh looking for work — but were driven back by state authorities with famine problems of their own.

SOME OF these desperate migrants have tried to leave their children at an American mission hospital in the area. But the hospital, struggling to keep going with barely enough water for its present needs, cannot cope.

The irony is that Orissa has enough food to feed everyone, though not lavishly. There are vast stocks of imported foreign food on which she could have drawn. So why was nothing swift and adequate done to save the people of the red areas from such suffering?

It is conceivable that news of what was happening in the interior was slow to come out. It is generally supposed here that the chief sufferers have been the aboriginal tribesmen up on their high conical hills and the untouchables. But this does not seem to be the whole truth.

Among the worst afflicted are many small farmers and simply to see them is to recognize that even in this present penury they have not lost their dignity. They tried to take care of themselves and did not appeal to government officials.

IT MIGHT be thought that district officials, by constantly touring the villages in their charge, would themselves have found out what was going on. But those I spoke to left me with the dismal impression that touring was not much in their line.

But impending disaster was also made manifest in the townships, within sight of government offices. There were people standing in long lines outside grain shops to buy "broken rice" — the husks with tiny fragments of rice lodged inside them. Then the village women started selling those small gold ornaments which are their whole treasure. Then the farmers sold the livestock and the tools without which they cannot farm.

It is difficult to think rational, these proceedings must have been observed or about the rapacity of those who did the buying at marvellously reduced prices.

But now Mrs. Gandhi herself has been to some of these red areas of Orissa. It is to be assumed that henceforth the big rescue operation will proceed with unresting zeal, that those ill-frequented roads will fill up with food trucks.

Millions May Starve In India Despite Aid, House Panel Hears

WORLD POVE RTY

By FELIX BELAIR

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14 — A grim picture of mass starvation on the Indian subcontinent was painted before the House Committee on Agriculture today at the opening of hearings on President Johnson's Food for Freedom program.

Dr. Roger Revelle, director of the Harvard Center for Population Studies, told the panel that "it is almost certain that tens of millions of people will starve" in India's famine "and there will be millions of deaths that would otherwise not occur."

"The saddest part of the story is that it may be too late for us and the other rich countries to help very much," Dr. Revelle said. "My recent experiences in India have filled me with a great personal concern about the desperate conditions that our fellow human beings face today in that deeply impoverished country."

Conference Considered

As the House committee hearings got under way, President Johnson told the Dutch Foreign Minister, Joseph Luns, that he was considering calling an international conference to develop and coordinate greater famine relief efforts for India.

The Foreign Minister said the conference idea was put forward by the President in view of what Mr. Luns termed "the frightful situation" in India.

Several times in the past the President has stressed the need for a joint effort by many nations to combat starvation in India. He said recently that he was considering special emergency legislation, presumably to help India pay some $150-million in shipping costs for United States wheat aid.

However, Mr. Luns's mention of an international meeting was the first such suggestion attributed to President Johnson. The Foreign Minister said that if the conference was called it would probably consider the economic needs of Pakistan as well. There was no indication of when or where the meeting would be held or of who would attend.

Dr. Revelle, a member of India's International Advisory Commission on Education, told the House panel that "the futu of mankind is being ground out on the anvil of India and the other impoverished countries."

He said that unless rich and poor countries together solved the problem of development, "the fate of all men in times to come will be the fate of India today."

"A livable world cannot long exist in which two-thirds of human beings never get enough to eat, and the remaining third are overfed," he said.

He urged an "all-out attack" on poverty and hunger through such measures as expanded food aid, United States financial support of population control programs, and technical and financial support for food-deficit countries trying to increase farm production and to provide protein supplements to fight malnutrition.

Must Rise 300 Million Tons

"If the underdeveloped countries are to reach self-sufficiency in food production by 1980, even at present low levels of nutrition," Dr. Revelle said, "production must rise by about 300 million tons, or about 50 per cent above the 1965 production level of 650 millions."

To reach this high level of production an increase in the land area under cultivation as well as in yield per acre would be required, he said.

In addition, a capital investment of about $80-billion would be needed over the next 15 years, he said. About $20-billion of that amount would be needed to purchase trucks and the first such suggestion attributed to President Johnson. The Foreign Minister said that if the conference was called it would probably consider the economic needs of Pakistan as well. There was no indication of when or where the meeting would be held or of who would attend.

Dr. Revelle, a member of India's International Advisory Commission on Education, told the House panel that "the futu of mankind is being ground out on the anvil of India and the other impoverished countries."

He said that unless rich and poor countries together solved the problem of development, "the fate of all men in times to come will be the fate of India today."

"A livable world cannot long exist in which two-thirds of human beings never get enough to eat, and the remaining third are overfed," he said.

He urged an "all-out attack" on poverty and hunger through such measures as expanded food aid, United States financial support of population control programs, and technical and financial support for food-deficit countries trying to increase farm production and to provide protein supplements to fight malnutrition.

Must Rise 300 Million Tons

"If the underdeveloped countries are to reach self-sufficiency in food production by 1980, even at present low levels of nutrition," Dr. Revelle said, "production must rise by about 300 million tons, or about 50 per cent above the 1965 production level of 650 millions."

To reach this high level of production an increase in the land area under cultivation as well as in yield per acre would be required, he said.

In addition, a capital investment of about $80-billion would be needed over the next 15 years, he said. About $20-billion of that amount would be needed to purchase trucks and tractors, road-building machinery, effective storage facilities and food processing plants, as well as pumps and tubular steel for wells.

In explanation of his statement that it "may already be too late" for donor countries to do much about preventing starvation in India, Dr. Revelle said that the distribution of famine relief supplies there after arrival in India was a major problem.

He said that some areas were without roads, and that port facilities were inadequate for the sudden influx of relief supplies required to prevent widespread starvation.

Dr. Irene B. Taeuber, Princeton University population specialist, joined Dr. Revelle in urging that United States aid funds be made available to provide birth-control assistance.

Sees Population of 7.5 Billion

Dr. Taeuber said that if present population growth rates continued the world's total population of three billion would increase to about 7.5 billion by the year 2000. But she said the question was not whether but how the population growth rate could be slowed.

The only choice was between reducing birth rates or acquiescing in "the rising death rates of hunger and disease, famine and epidemic, internal instability and international conflict," she said.

In an opening statement on the projected month-long hearing, the committee chairman, Representative Harold D. Cooley, Democrat of North Carolina, said that the inquiry would not be limited to any particular bill.

At the same time, Mr. Cooley criticized Administration plans to take 40 million more acres of American farm land out of cultivation while farmers are paid not to plant 60 million acres.

He said that under the Administration plan, whole farms could be taken out of cultivation at an added cost of about $9-billion or $10-billion.

"Then the farmers could retire to Florida," he said. "But other tens of thousands would be driven to the cities looking for jobs that are not there and would take their place on the relief rolls."

Population, Man's Works Threaten Survival of Race

By GEORGE GETZE
Los Angeles Times News Service

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 23—Life on earth probably will persist for millions of years, but there is little chance man will be among the surviving species, a Harvard zoologist said here.

Ernst Mayr, director of the Harvard Museum of Comparative Zoology, said in an interview that we may soon know whether man will survive. Either some cataclysmic event, such as a nuclear war, will end man's tenure on earth, or through a tremendous effort of self-control he will make a new start, Mayr believes.

One or the other probably will take place in the lifetimes of people now living, he said.

Describing himself as pessimistic of man's chances for survival, Mayr pointed out that 99 per cent of all life-forms which have existed have become extinct.

IF MAN IS to persist on earth there are two things he must do, and do at once, according to the Harvard scientist. He must quickly learn to control the increasing human population, and he must learn to stop destroying the environment.

"Man's ability to control the environment was said to be his biggest advantage over other species," Mayr said.

"In the beginning this was true, as he invented shelters and clothing to protect him from the weather, and weapons and tools to help him harness the productivity of nature."

Mayr said the contrast of those ancient times with these modern times is dismal.

"Now almost everything we do is harmful to the species and works against its survival. We make the air unfit to breathe, the water unfit to drink, we seed the atmosphere with radioactivity, erode the soil, clear the land and plaster it with asphalt and concrete," he said. "Our destruction of our environment seems endless."

The popular concern with birth control is felt by some optimists to be a sign that man is at last becoming aware of his peril, but Mayr doesn't think the necessary mass realization will come in time to avoid a catastrophe.

"AN UNDERSTANDING of evolutionary biology would help control the population, and also could help improve it," Mayr said.

He said the only practical way to improve the human race is to use "positive eugenics"—to see to it that those with superior genes have more children and that those with inferior genes have fewer.

But Mayr said this is now considered immoral and unacceptable, and he conceded there are cogent objections:

How would it be decided which inherited characteristics were the best for the human race in the long run? Some things we now consider good are probably bad for the species.

Who would decide which men and women would be permitted to have children?

Mayr said many people also objected to eugenics because it interferes with individual freedom.

He said the study of evolution shows that man must make an effort to improve himself as well as to limit his numbers.

Dear Sirs:

The Human Relations Committee and the Scholarship Information Sub-committe e have compiled a booklet this year entitled Financial Aid for Southern Negroes. At the present time, we are also isuing from time to time bulletins which we feel wil be of interes t to Negro students in high school or in college. We are planning a leaflet on the advantages of going to an interracial school and would like to append the list of desegregated colleges contained in your L report number L-23D. May we have your permission to use the information therein?

Sincerely yours,

Tony Mason
